When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discouer vnto them his project; letting them vnderstand, That there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Ile of Sicill, than by bringing the warre to their owne dores. For here (said hee) they haue many that hate them, and that will readily take armes against them, as soone as they perceiue that there 20 is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified; their people vntrained, and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercinarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can giue; which we may better promise and make good, by letting them haue some (here with vs) in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus hee talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue wordes encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reseruing one or two, to vse as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, save only in victorie. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; 30 which after they had thoroughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicill. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage, vnto the enemy; they raise a great Armie, and know not vnto whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno, and Bomil. 40 car; great enemies, and therefore the more vnlike to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generalls of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldom happens, that dissension betwene Commanders produceth any fortunate euent. Necessitie draue Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not stirre: but suffered Hanno to be cut in peeces.

The reputation of this victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian Societie, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victorie, wins many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicill, willing Amilcar, their General, to succour the state of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whilst hee was traouling in the conquest of Sicill. Amilcar sends them five thousand men: all his forces he thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicill, than to bee drauene home home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had a bad issue. He spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracusians: and hauing brought his matters to some good order, he conceived a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surpris. It was a pretie (though tragically) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that he should suppe the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and he beleued it. He made more haste, than good speede, toward the Citie: and coming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carrie it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrap him, wherein he fell. So he was 10 carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likeely, that he had no great cheare for his supper: for they struck off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. He had allured Ophelias, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliuer the Countrie into his hands: for that (as he said) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to haue diuerted the Carthaginians from Sicill, wherein (after this warre ended) he might raigne quietly. Ophelias came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traitorous Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murder this his assistant; 20 and afterwards, by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his warres. Thus his villanie found good successe; and he fo preuailed in Africk, that he got leifure to make a slep into Sicill. Many Townes in Sicill had imbraced a desire of recouering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, alter that they had so long bene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrie. These had preuailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to obedience. Out of Sicill he returned into Africk, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his sonne, had lost a battle; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to help himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoile. It had now bene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) haue giuen to him, both monie enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicill. For their Citie had bene distressed, not only by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the losse of a battaile, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange euents following it. The Cartha- 40 ginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the said Idol, in way of thankfulness for their victorie. The fire, with which these vnhappy men were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings neere vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult, as is vsuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt vp the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away; each of them beleueing, that the noise in the aduerser Campe, was a signe of the enemies coming to invade it. 50 But the Carthaginians had a safe retreat: Agathocles, by a second error, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to bee enemies, (as indeede the one halfe of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) hee beganne to assaile them, and was so stoutly resisted, that he lost, in this blinde fight, above about foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neere hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, hee knew no more how to moderate his present weake feares, than lately he had know how to gouerne his ambition. Therefore he tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to scale closely aboard his ships, with his younger sonne (the elder he suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flie into Sicily; thinking it the best course, to shiit for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Armie. His elder sonne, Archagathus, perceived his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by meanes of a sudden tumult, hee was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leauing both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noised through the Armie, all was in vprore; and extremitie of rage caused not only the common Souldier, but euen such as had bene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathodes was extremely bafe; I neede not vse wordes to proue: That his feare was truly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriving him of the succours which reason offered, the sequels doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuerthelesse a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for ninetene talents. Likewise, Agathodes himselfe, hauing lost his Armie, did neuerthelesse, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace 20 with Carthage vpon equall termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discouered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his teares, vrged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoiles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee deuiled new engines of torment; wherein struiuing to exceede the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of brasie, that should serue to scorch mens bodies, and withall giue him leaue to behold them in their miserie. So deuillish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slave to his brutish affections. In these mischiefs he was so outrageous, that he neither spared 30 Sex, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africa. But this was not the way to preserve his estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom hee had chased out of their Countie, tooke armes against him, and draue him into such feare, that hee was faine to seeke the loue at Carthage, which, by ruling well, he might haue had in Sicily. He freely deliuered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phoenicians in Sicily, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They required him honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he preuailed against the Rebels, and settled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Sicily, hee made a voiage into Italie. There hee 40 subdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yeelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great summe, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to spoile the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinks) he did well enough. For how could he beleue those to be gods, that had continually giuen deafe eares to his horrible perjuries? Then hee returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea; one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grievous sicknesse fell vpon him, that rorted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theogenia (a wife that hee had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger sonne of his owne, beganne to contend about the 50 Kingdome, Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well, that hee slue his Vncle, and got his Grand-fathers Kingdome without asking any leaue. These tidings wounded the heart of Agathodes with feare and sorrow. He saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a prey to his vngacious Nephew, from whom hee knew that no fauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom only hee now held deare, which were, Theogenia, and her children. Therefore hee aduised her and them to flie before they were surpris'd: for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoid, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. Hee gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselves hastily, and make speede into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his discafe consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but he ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as he first beganne it.

After the death of Agathodes it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traitreously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the land. Then also did the Carthaginians beginne to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicily. What the Nephew of Agathodes did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished. 20 For the Sicilians were driuen to send for Pyrrhus to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of Agathodes. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countie (as hath bene shewed before) and therefore left it; prophesying that it would become a goodly champagne field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superiority. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speede, the order of our Storie will declare.

§. V.

30 Recontinuation of the Roman warre in Sicily. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsooke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

Hen Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great Citie; Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to be offended with him, for helping himselfe by what meanes he could, when they were not in case to giue him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once hee 40 had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the mastery. In this good moode, the new Roman Consulls, M. Valerius, and C. Otacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made vse of their present aduantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consulls had brought a great Armie into Sicily; yet did they nothing else inuest, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syracusan held them busied (which I finde not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the 50 whole time of their abode in the land; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to runne into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straying them.

themselves to give him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathodes: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare out a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slack, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne warre might be the easier against them both. Yet indeede, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had beene, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to trie the vttermost hazard of warre against the Carthaginians, who fought no other thing than to bring it into slavery: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient, if they could withdraw it from the partie of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathodes, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, so long as he might preferue his owne tyrannie: the later, as a just and good Prince, had no greater desire than to winne the loue of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that hee enjoyed a long and happie raigne, liuing deare to his owne Subjects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their Societie, made vnwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compasse it. 20

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine assault. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Sea-fight in generall.

* Agrigentum was a goodly Citie, built by the Gelsi, vnder conduct of Arifon and Dylisius.

HIERO, hauing sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victuals, and other necessities: so that they, presuming vpon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troups they had in Spain, to come to their aide; who being arrived, they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the seat of the warre, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition. The Roman Consuls, hauing made peace with Hiero, returne into Italy, and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus, and Quintus Mamilius arriue. They goe on towards * Agrigentum: and finding 40 no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were fluffed with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of haruelt being come, a part of the Roman armie range the Countrey to gather corne, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sallie furiously, and endanger the Roman Armie, but are great losse: but by the smart felt on both 50 sides, the Assaults redoubled their guards, & the besieged kept within their couert. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deepe trench, be-

tweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe: and another on the out side thereof, that neither the Carthaginians might force any quarter suddenly, by a sallie, nor those of the Countrey without, breake vpon them vnawares: which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiuing any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whilst the Syracusen supplies the Assaults with what they went. The besieged find for succour to Carthage: after they had beene in this sort pent vp five moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno; who arriues with it at Heraclia, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesius, a Citie wherein the Romans had belloved all their prouision. By means herof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no lesse streightly assailed by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romans: in somuch, as if Hiero had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise; Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclia, hee makes approach vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolute to sustain him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directes the Nomidian horse-men to charge their Vanguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. 20 The Nomidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Nomidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and hauing slaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly incamped, waiting vntill some opportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal, that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know, how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke such dilatorie courtesies. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consuls to fight. But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vanguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recouered Heraclia. Annibal 30 perceiving this, and remaying hopelesse of succour, resolute to make his owne way, finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victorie, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; hee rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: sure they were, that he could not carrie the Citie with him, which with little ado the Romans entred, and pittifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purpose henceforth rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolute in the beginning of this Warre, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts: 40 but now they determine, to make themselves Lords of all Sicily; and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good successe, to saile ouer into Africa. It is the discafe of Kings, of States, and of priuate men, to couet the greatest things, but not to enioy the least; the desire of that which wee neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what wee haue already. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World to this day.

To prosecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus Otacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicily. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many inland Townes gave themselves vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians 50 keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritime places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often invaded by the African fleets, as also to equall themselves in every kind of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in shipwrights-craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romans a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quinquemes, which were Gallies, rowed by five on euery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke: and while they were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-lands many leates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the sand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Maister, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, to C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed euery yere) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kind of warfare, then well aduised, past ouer to Messina with seuentene Gallies, leauing the rest to follow him. There hee staid not, but would needs row alongst the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of seruice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian, was at the same time Gouvernour in Panormus; who being aduertised of this new Sea-mans arriuall, sent forth one Boodes, a Senator of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, sailing vpon the Consull vnwares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal receiued this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consull; he grew no lesse foolish hardie than Cornelius had bene. For hee, fancying to himselfe to surpriue the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points provided; sought them out with a fleet of fittie saile: wherewith falling among them, hee was well beaten, and leauing the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans vnder Cornelius had lost but seuentene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fittie.

The Romans, being aduertised of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but giue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Dulius. Dulius, considering that the Roman vessels were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speede of them, deuised a certaine engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the waightier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serue them, nor their Mariners craft; the Vessells, wherin both Nations fought, being open: so that al was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heauier Gallies were likely to crush and crack the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by reason of their breadth, more steadie; and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may bee giuen betwene one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a London barge.

Certainly, hee that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must bee skillfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in: hee must beleue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betwene fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre: for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Strozzi, lost at the Azores, when hee fought against the Marquess of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, been lost in the yere 1588, if he had not bene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that so found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboard them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himselfe with those great and powerfull Vessells, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter, whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselves withall. But our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it: which had he not done, hee had not bene worthie to haue held his head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for private hands, then for the Presse) I say, That a fleet of twenty ships, all good sailers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselves neere together, in a grosse Squadron; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall back vpon their next fellows: of which so many as intangle, are made vneruiceable, or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which giue themselves scope, after they haue giuen one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may giue them the other: and so the twentie ships batter them in pieces with a perpetuall vollie; whereas those, that fight in a troupe, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vse but one and the same beate side. If the fleet of an hundred saile giue themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet preuaile, either against those that are a-reare and hindmost, or against those, that by aduantage of ouer-sailing their fellows keepe the winde: and if vpon a Lee-shore, the ships next the winde be constrained to fall back into their own Squadron, then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet must suffer shipwrack, or render it selfe. That such aduantage may be taken vpon a fleet of vnequall speed, it hath bene wel enough conceiued in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusanians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be obserued.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord HENRIE, Prince of Wales; a subiect, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sunne, wee shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equal words and forrowes; I will therefore leaue him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leues loquuntur, ingenites silent.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by loosing their aduantage of swift boats, and boarding the Romans, haue lost fittie saile of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, haue gotten liberty to saile about the West part of Sicily; where they raised the siege layed vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

Diuers enterfeats of warre, betwene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to invade Africk: and obtaine a great victorie at Sea.

He victorie of Dulius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Nauall triumph, that was euer scene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great encouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not onely to get Sicily, but all the other lies betwene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, which hee soon after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being aduertised, that some quarrell

was

victorie before them without resistance. By the same order of fight, and reservation, did the Romans also preuaile against other Nations. For they kept their Triarj in store (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-shot and last blow. A great and a victorious aduantage it hath euer bene found, to keepe some one or two good troups to looke on, when all else are disbanded and engaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans preuaile in Affric. Atilius the Consul propoundeth in-olerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is viterly beaten, and made prisoner.

Now the Romans, according to their former resolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleet, set saile for Africa, and arrived at the Promontorie of Hercules, a great Head-land, somewhat to the East of the Port of Carthage, and some fortie leagues from Heracleum Sicily, where Amilcar himselfe as yet staid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coasted the East-side of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne, about fiftie English mile from it. There they disembarked, and prepared to besiege Clypea; which, to ease them of labour, was yee-ded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa side; without which all inuasions are foolish. By this time were the Africans also arrived at their owne Carthage; fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themselves thither:
but being aduertised, that they had taken Clypea, they made prouisions of all sorts:
both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans send to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waste all round about them. The order giuen from the Senate, was, that one of the Consuls should remaine with the Armie, and that the other should returne, with the fleet into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Consul is sent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thousand African captiues, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ships, fiftene thousand foot, and five hundred horse, that were left with Atilius.

With these forces, Regulus easily wanne some Townes and Places, that were vn-walled, and laid siege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came vnto Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the Riuer of Bagrada, he encountered with a Serpent of one hundred and twentie foot long, which he slue, not without losse of many Souldiers, being driuen to vse against it such engines of warre, as serued properly for the assaulting of Townes. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captiues were Hanno and Basar, together with Amilcar, who had brought ouer out of Sicily five thousand foot, and five hundred horse to succour his Countie. These (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were careful to hold themselves free, from necessitie of coming to blowes, yet had they a great desire, to saue the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpose, and yet to disturbe him in the siege of Adis, they incampe neere vnto him, and strongly (as they thinke) on the top of an hill: but thereby they loose the seruices, both of their Elephants, and of their horse-men. This disadvantage of theirs Regulus discouers, and makes vse of it.
He assailes them in their strength, which they defend a while; but in fine the Romans preuaile, and force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceede to * Tunis a Citie within fiftene miles of Carthage, which they assaile and take.

* This Citie was taken from the Triarj by Charles the fifth, in the yeere 1536, and was one of the three Keyes, which he gaue in charge to Philip the second his sonne to keepe safe; to win this Tunis, the Key of Africa; Flushing, the Key of the Netherlands; and Calice, the Key of Spain. But two of these Philip lost, the other he neuer found againe; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queene Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands: where we staid not to pick any locke, but brake open the dores, and hazing rifled all, threw it into the fire.

By

By the losse of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismayed. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and spoile their Territory, and force those that inhabite abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselues within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius findes his owne aduantage, and assures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out: yet he feared lest it might defend it selfe, vntill his time of Office, that was neere expired, should be quite runne out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them so vnworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so couragious and disdainfull, that they resolved, either to defend their libertie, or to die to the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, they arrived at the same time a great troupe of Greekes, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, and of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians receiued neere vnto Adis, gaue it out publickely, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ranne, till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; giues the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he puts himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led, consisted of no more than twelue thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces, wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertie, Liues, Goods, Wives, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea, before spoken of, were misse-numbered; the one consisting of an hundred and fortie thousand, and the other of an hundred and fiftie thousand: were it not commonly found, that they which vse the service of mercinarie Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne dores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troups vpon faire and leuell ground, fitted both for his Elephants and Horse, presented them battaile. The Romans wondred, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were that it should be soone abated. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants.
Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a ferocious hope; that these might, either with darts and other casting weapons, driue back the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had bene accustomed to doe. By which means, as they were the lesse subject vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they the more exposed vnto the violence of horse, wherein the enemy did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a reasonable distance: his horse-men, and some light-armed foot, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The first onset was giuen by the Elephants, against which the Velites were so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Roman battaile was helpfull. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through a few of the first ranks; the squadrons neuertheless persisted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, hauing at the first encounter, by reason of their aduantage in number, driuen those of Atilius out of the field, beganne to charge the Roman battalions in flanke, and put them in great distresse;
who being forced to turne face every way, could neither passe forward, nor yet retire: but had much adoe to make good the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Romans, as had escaped the furie of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell vpon the Carthaginian Armie, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a disordered Companie, wearied with labour, and hurt; the other, fresh, and well prepared, to haue dealt with the enemy vpon equall termes. Here was therefore a greater slaughter with little fight; the Romans haistily recoiling to the bodie of their Armie; which being surrounded with the enemy, and spint with traualle, fell all to rout, vpon the defeat of these troupes, that open the way to a generall ouerthrow. So the Carthaginians obtayned a full victorie; destroyng the whole Roman Armie, saued two thousand, and taking fise hundred prisoners, together with Attilius the Consull. Of their owne they loit no more than eight hundred mercenaries, which were slaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans; that wheeling about, to auoide the Elephants, bare downe all before them, and made way euen to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no lesse her vassalls, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent foucet they had beene in their proposition of peace; as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which she neuer gave nor sold to any mortall man. With what ioy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, wee may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no lesse then this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that sentence of EVARISTUS DE PLINIO, Mens vna sapientis, plurium vniuit manus; Many mens hands equall not one wise minde.

After this great seruice done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more enuied then honoured, or for what other cause it is vnknewne.

The death of Attilius Regulus the Consull, was very memorabie. Hee was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ranome of prisoners on both sides: giuing his faith to returne if the buisnesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Countrie should loose by the bargain: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his owne miserie, that he earnestly perswaded to haue the prisoners in Africk left to their ill destinies. This done, hee returned to Carthage: where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to haue iudged him an obstinate and malicious enemy; that neither in his prosperitie would harken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care, to perseue himselfe and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small advantage. Whatsoeuer the Carthaginians thought of him; sure it is, that his faithfull obseruance of his word giuen, cannot be too much commended. But that graue speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appeares in all reason, to haue proceeded from a vaine-glorious forwardnesse, rather than from any necessitie of state. For the exchange was made soone after his death; wherein the Romans had the worse bargain, by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authoritie of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to consider that they liued vnder the Roman Empire. Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreme torments, could not be more greivous to him than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither doe I think that the Carthaginians could excuse themselves herein; otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romans deferred to bene better intreated for as much as it was their ordinary practice to vse others in the like sort. Crueltie doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being custumarie. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were such, as had alwaies made laire waies with them. Wherefore fore it seemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall insolence in others, as if it were lawfull only in themselves.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Attilius his intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, wherinto the Carthaginians feare was changed by meere desperation; calls to remembrance the like insolencie of others in prosperitie, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom all reasonable grace hath bene denied. In such cases I neuer hold it impertinent, to adde vnto one, more testimonies; approving the true rules, from which our passions carrie vs away.

- 10 In the yeere 1378. the Genowais wonne so fast vpon the Venetians, as they not only draue their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their owne fleet within two miles of Venice it selfe. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genowais (their State referred) whatsoeuer they would demand. But Peter Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would harken to no composition; saw the yeelding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon, the Venetians, being filled with disdain, thrull out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assaile Doria with such desperate furie, that they breake his fleet; kill Doria himselfe; take nineteene of his Gallies, fourescore boats of Padua, and foure thousand prisoners; recover Chioggia, and all the places taken
- 20 from them; and following their victorie, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genowais, basely to begge peace, to their extreme dishonour and disadvantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might haue commanded, to their greatest honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the yeere 1380, when hauing taken a notable, and withall an ouer-cruell reuenge vpon the Gantois, he refused mercy to the rest, who in all humilitie, submitting themselves to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had vnadvisedly refused, and was resolu'd to extinguish them vtterly; they issue out of their Citie with fise thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell)
- 30 with his vanquished followers; and enforce him to hide himselfe vnder an heape of straw, in a poore cottage; out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and saued himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against ATTILIVS: How the Romans hauing lost their fleet by tempest, resolu'd to forsake the Seas: The great advantages of a good fleet in warre, betwene Nations diuided by the Sea.

- 40 BY the reputation of this late victory, all places that had bene lost in Africk, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Onely Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit downe, and assaile it, but in vaine: For the Romans, hearing of the losse of Attilius with their forces in Africk, and withall, that Clypea was besieged, make ready a grosse Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fiftie Gallies, commanded by M. Aemilius, and Ser. Fulnius, their Consuls. At the Promontory of Mercure, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, vpon the bruit of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans tooke by force an hundred and fourteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their owne men that had bene besieged: and this done, they made amaine toward Sicily, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty voyage they despise the aduice of the Pilots,

* There is no Part of the World, which hath no some certaine times of outrageous weather besides their accidental stormes. We have vpon our coast a Michaelmas Blaw, that seldom or neuer failes; in the west Indies, in the monthes of Auguſt and September, those most terrible winds, which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or Northwinds, are very fearefull; and therefore they that Nauigate in those parts, take harbor till those months take end. Charls the fifth being as ill aduised, in passing the Seas towards Alger, in the Winter quarter, contrary to the counsaile of A. Donia, as he was in like vnfayorable times to continue his siege before Mexin in Laraine, lost an hundred and foure ships by tempest, and fiftene Gallies, with all in effect in store of men, vittualles, horses, and munition; a losse no lesse great, than his retreat, both from before the one and the other; was extreme dishonourable.

Pilots, who pray them to finde harbour in time, for that the season threatened some violent stormes; which euer hapned betweene the rising of Orion, and the * Deg. ſarre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South coast of Sicill had no good Ports, wherein to faue themselves vpon such an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perfwaded, that the winde and seas feared them no lesse, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer the Elements themselves. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they were aduised, they would needes put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation; after this victorie against the Carthaginian fleet; to take a few worthlesse Townes vpon the coast. The mercilesse windes in the meane while ouertake them, and neere vnto Camerina, ouerturne and thrust headlong on the rocks, all but fourecore of three hundred and foure ships: so as their former great victorie was deuoured by the Seas, before the same thereof recovered Rome. The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repaire all their warlike Vessells, hoping once againe to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-²⁰ forces (since the overthrow of Attilius). They send Asdrubal into Sicill with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortie Elephants, imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arrives at Lilybaum; where hee begins to vex the Partisans of Rome. But aduersitie doth not discourage the Romans: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twentie ships; with which, and the remainder of their late shipwracke, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicill, and surround it by Land and Water; after a while they take it, and leauing a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to bee doing in Africk: to which purpose they imploied C. Seruilus, and C. Semprenius, their Consuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoile they made vpon the coasts of Africa: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to haue perished, neere vnto the lesser Syrtes, where they were faine to heaue all ouer-board, that so they might get off: then, hauing with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybaum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fiftie of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the God of the warres fauoured them no more, than the God of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, foure hundred & fixe ships and Gallies, with all the munition and ⁴⁰ Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perfwaded them to giue over their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-armie into Sicill, vnder L. Caelius, and F. Furius, their Consuls. These they transported in some threecore ordinarie passage-boats, by the straits of Messana, that are not above a mile and an halfe broad from land to land. In like sort, the overthrow which Attilius received in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse cholericke against the Carthaginians, than before, so that for two yeeres after, they kept the high and woodie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champion Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas lasted not long. For it was impossible for⁵⁰ them to succour those places which they held in Sicill, without a Naue, much lesse to maintaine the warre in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybaum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicill, making sometimes a march of about an hundred and forty Engliſh mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the prouisions that follow it, in lesse than foureteen daies; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and fortie houres.

An old example we haue, of that great advantage of transporting Armies by water, betweene Canutus, and Edmond Ironſide. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Naue and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued; and failing to the West, landed in Dorſetſhire, so drawing Edmond and his Armie thither. There finding ill entertainment, he againe shipt his men, and entred the Seuerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worceſterſhire, by him greatly spoiled. But when he had Edmond there, hee failed back againe to London: by meanes whereof, he both wearied the King, and spoiled where hee pleased, ere succour could arrive. And this was not the least helpe, which the Netherlands haue had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their libertie, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Armie from place to place, vnwearied, and entire, with all the Munition and Artilerie belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies haue beene able to doe it. Of this an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now living, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceeding Ages haue brought forth, in the yeare 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with fortie Canons, to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Boisſeleue, or Gertruiden Berg; which the enemy (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and vittuals. But as soone as the winde serued, he suddenly set saile, and arriving in the mouth of the Meuse, turned vnto the Rhine, and thence to Tyfel, and late downe before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march ouer land round about Holland, about fourecore mile, and ouer many great Riuers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Again, when the Spaniſh Armie had ouercome this wearisome march, and were now farre from home, the Prince Maurice, making countenance to saile vnto the Rhine, changed his course in the night; and sailing downe the streame, he was set downe before Hulſt in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Towne he also tooke, before the Spaniſh armie could returne. Lastly, the Spaniſh armie was no sooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, hauing fortified Hulſt, set saile againe, and presented himselfe before Nymegen in Gelders, a Citie of notable importance, and maltred it.

And to say the truth; it is impossible for any maritime Countie, not hauing the coasts admirably fortified, to defend it selfe against a powerfull enemy, that is master of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England should bee an example. Let it therefore be supposed, that King Philip the second had fully resolved to hinder Sir John Norris in the yeare 1589. from presenting Don Antonio, King of Portugall, before the gates of Lisborne; and that he would haue kept off the Engliſh, by power of his land-forces; as being too weak a Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeere foregoing. Surely, it had not beene hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that should be able to resist our eleuenthouſand. But where should this his Armie haue beene bellowed? If about Lisborne, then would it haue bene caſie vnto the Engliſh, to take, ranſack, and burne the Towne of Groine, and to waste the Countie round about it. For the great and threatening preparations, of the Earle of Albemarle, the Markeſſe of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the haſtie leaue of eight thouſand, vnder the Earle of Andrada, serue to more effect, than the increaſe of honour to Sir John Norris, and his Associates: considering, that the Engliſh charged these at Puente de Burgos, and passing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with shot, and barricaded at the further end, routed them; tooke their campe; tooke their Generalls ſtandard with the Kings Armes, and pursued them ouer all the Countie, which they fired. If a roiall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of priuate aduenturers, had thus begunne begunne the warre in Galicia, I thinke it would haue made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haste to the defence of their St. Iago, whose Temple was not farre from the danger. But, had they held their first resolution; as knowing, that Sir Iohn Norris his maine intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armie, into his Kingdome, whither comming strong, he expected to bee readily and joyfully welcomed: could they haue hindered his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Fenicha, and march ouer the Countrie to Lyborne, fixe daies iournie? Did not hee (when all Don Antonio his promises failed) passe along by the Riuer of Lyborne to Casalic, and there, hauing wonne the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But these, though no more than a handiull, yet were they Englismen. Let vs consider of the matter it selfe; what an other Nation might doe, euen against England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if wee had none. This question, Whether an invading Armie may be resisted at their landing vpon the coast of England, werethere no fleets of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obseruations vpon Casars Commentaries, that maintaine the affirmatiue. This he holds only vpon supposition; in absence of our shipping: and comparatively, as, that it is a more safe and easie course, to defend all the coast of England, than to suffer an enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the best way, to keepe our enemy from treading vpon our ground: wherein, if wee faile, then must wee seeke to make him so with, that he had laied at his owne home. In such a case, if it should happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particular circumstances, that belong not vnto this discourse. But making the question general, and positive, whether England, without helpe of her fleet, be able to debarre an enemy from landing; I hold that it is vnable so to doe: and therefore I thinke it most dangerous to make the aduventure. For the encouragement of a first victorie to an enemy, and the discouragement of being beaten to the inuaded, may draw after it a most perillous consequence.

It is true, that the Marshall Monluc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to haue kept the frontier of Guienne, they of the Protestant religion, after the battaile of Moncouter, entred that Countie, and gathered great strength and reliefe thence; for if the King (saith he) would haue giuen me but reasonable means; jeuse bien garde a Monsieur l'Admiral, de faire faire ses Cheueux en la Garonne; I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horses in the Riuer of Garonne. Monsieur de Longey, on the contrary side, prefers the not fighting vpon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commendeth the delay; which course the Constable of France held, against the Emperour Charles, when hee inuaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diuerse consideration to be had, betwene such a Countie as France is, strengthened with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inuasions vpon firme land, that these great Capitaines spake: whose entrances cannot be vncertaine. But our question is, of an Armie to be transported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Countie, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I say, That such an Armie cannot be resisted on the coast of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coast of France, or any other Countie: except euery Creeke, Port, or sandie Bay, had a powerfull Armie, in each of them, to make opposition. For let his whole supposition be granted; That Xent is able to furnish twelue thousand foot; and that those twelue thousand be laied in the three best landing places within that Countie, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and fixe thousand at Foulkeston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troupes (vnlesse some other order be thought more fit) bee directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this prouision, if the enemy, setting saile from the Isle of Wight, in the first first watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their sternes, shall arrive by dawne of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Armie on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twentie and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulkeston bee able to doe it, who are neerer by more than halfe the way? seeing that the enemy, at his first arriual, will cyther make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to runne; or else giue them so much to doe, that they shall be glad to send for helpe to Foulkeston; and perhaps to Margat: where-10 by those places will bee left bare. Now let vs suppose, that all the twelue thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be ready to disimbarque his Armie, so that hee shall finde it vn safe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we beleue, that he will play the best of his owne game; and (hauing liberty to goe which way he list) vnder couert of the night, let layle towards the East, where what I shall hinder him to take ground, cyther at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to doe it. Yea the like may bee sayd of Weymouth, Purbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily

20 or runne the Souldiers that coast them: Les Armees ne violent point en passe; Armes ne they flye, nor rusne poss, sayth a Marshall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of Ships may be leene at Sunne-set, and after it, at the Lisard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot shall not bee able to march it in fixe dayes. Again, when those troupes, lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to runne from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships; they will at length sit downe in the mid-way, and leaue all at aduerture. But say it were otherwise; That the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Armie of ours ready to receiue him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders
20 and Capitaines, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeare 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London; they that remaine to guard the coast, can be of no such force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should haue landed in England.

The Ile of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in such a case. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthened by art: it being euery where hard of access; hauing no good harbour wherin to shelter a Nauie of friends; and vpon euery couer or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monsieur
40 de Chaites, that held it to the vse of Don Antonio, with five or fixe thousand men, thought to haue kept the Marquesse of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquesse hauing shewed himselfe in the Roade of Angra, did let saile, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, farre distant from thence, where hee wanne a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chaites, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Stralster, flaine the yeere before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chaites and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our Englsh would bee perswaded to 50 make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and backe againe, it may bee doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselves preuented by the more nimble ships of Spaine.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England,
H h h h h
France,

France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindred, encountered, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our Englishs, at Fayal, in the yeere 1597. is alleged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those Englishs in Fayal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may by a ciuill interpretation, thinke, that there was no purpose to detract me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprise was such, or so ill managed, that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeed some which were in that voyage, who aduised me not to vndertake it; and I harkened vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilst they desired mee, to reserve the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficultie: I gaue them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, then to invade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more ease then I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place, yea even there where I landed, if I would haue taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince & Nation, that a few Islanders should not think any aduantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some Low-Country Capitaines, and others, not of mine owne squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceipt (though it would haue bin short, when I had landed in some other place) that for want of their helpe I was driven to turne taile. Therefore Iooke with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harney, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Thimpe, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Capitaine Laurence Kemis, Capitaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselves and the enemy: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vnderooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepnesse of the Cliffs, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or sixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing abandon the wal, whereon their Musketers lay on the rest for vs, and wonne the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done with lesse danger, so that it should not haue serued for example of a rule, that failed euery in this example: but the reasons before alleged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more private, then to be here laid downe) made me rather follow the way of brauerie, and take the shorter course; hauing it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemy was more then a Coward; (which yet was more then we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom had I thought equal to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concerns the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled vs more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to stop vs in place of his aduantage; that many of our men were slayne or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to bee past, when we had wonne good footing) would needes follow vs to the Town were driven by him, to forsake the pace of a man of warre, and betake themselves to an halste trot.

For end of this digression. I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Majesties many mouable Forts forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdain, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten vpon vpon their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemy; yet to entaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Majestic, after God, will imploie his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment vpon the shore.

How the Romans attempt againe to get the mastery of the Seas. The victorie of Cæsar. Cælius the Roman Confull as Panormus: The siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilybæum at pleasure, in despite of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grieuous losses recieued, vnder CLAVDIUS and LVRIUS their Confulls, abandon the Seas againe.

Then, without a strong Nauie, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicily, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resolved once againe, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of warre. So causing fiftie new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Confulls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiuing that the Romans, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they recieued by Scipio in Africa, were lesse daring than they had bene in the beginning of the warre; and withall, that one of the Confulls was returned into Italy, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cælius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cælius to fight. But the Confull was better aduised. For when Asdrubal had made his approaches somewhat neerer the Towne, Cælius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gaue order that they should aduance themselves, and passe ouer the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawne on the Elephants to the brink of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being enraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiously vpon their owne foot men, and vterly disordered them. Cælius, espying this aduantage, sallied with all the force hee had; and charging the other troupes, that stood embattailed, he vtterly brake them, and put them to their heels, making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victorie being brought to Rome, the whole state, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicily, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted fourteene yeeres. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolved to attempt Lilybæum, the onely place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicily; and all (indeed) saue Drepanum, that was neere adjoining. They set downe before it, and possessed themselves of all the places of aduantage neere vnto it, especially of such as command the haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fixe towres of defence, & by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the city, as the defendants begin to despair.

Yet Himilco, Commander of the Place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, herepaired with admirable diligences, he maketh many furious sallies, and giuech to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is revealed by an Achean, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saved Agriegenum. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers; and employeth Hannibal to appease the troops of the Gauls, which did wauer, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vnable to performe what they had vnderaken, are faine to lue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good whereby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hannibal the sonne of Amilcar, for their Conductor: who, in despite of all resistance, entered the Port and Citie, to the incredible ioy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolue to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vermouth, with great laughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, 20 and hauing the aduantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybeum, but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vnderakes the seruice; and hauing recieued his dispatch, failes with one Gallie to Agulus, a little Iland neere Lilybeum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Chennel, and recovered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke night, nor dreading to be boarded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipping his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of steerage, and himselfe expert in all parts of the chennel) recovered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despite of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauens, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, to vnderake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondrous at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a farre-off, the aduantage which this Rhodian made, was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and iudicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the helpe of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: no, though fortie peeces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke and Sweden were at Warre; our East-land fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subiects of his enemies, and he threatened to sinke their ships if they came through the brights of Elfenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maidier, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduventure; and sustaining some Vollics of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the prouision he could, to stop them, or sinke them, at their returne. But 50 the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burroughs, leading the way, did not only passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elfenour; which at that time was not so well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound receiued. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise then by famine, laid his Cannon on the bancke of the Riuer, so well to purpose, and so euen with the face of the water, that he thought it impossible for the least boat to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blowne vp by any winde of glorie, but coming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheese, euen the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreme deare in Antwerp, passed in boats of ten or twelue Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despite of it, when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of flood fauoured them; as also with a contrarie 10 winde, and an ebbing water, they turned backe againe: so as he was forced, in the ende, to build his Stockado ouerthwart the Riuer, to his maruailous trouble and charge.

The Fort St. Philip terrified not vs in the yeere 1596. when we entered the Port of Caliz; neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat vs from our anchoring by it; though it plaied vpon vs with foure Demi-cannons within point blanche, from fixe in the morning till twelue at noone. The siege of Offend, and of many other places, may be giuen for prooffe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angra in Terceira, that there is no passage along be- 30 side it, or that the ships are driuen to turne vpon a bow line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great vse, and fearefull: otherwife not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: Hee arriues in safetie at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybeum. Others also, after this take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to choke the chennel; and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sinke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe in part: but they grounded so many of those great-bellied boats in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Iland, in the pas- 30 sage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the braue Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chase, and gathered vpon him; he findes what thees, both by her forme and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolved to fight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybeum, after this, is greatly distressed; so the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despair there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans wooden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Lilybeum, were 40 ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier vnderakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellows of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despair and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they reioice, by a long siege, to starue the defendants.

Vpon relation of what had past, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, vnder Mc. Claudius, the Consull. He arriues at Messina, and marcheth our land to Lilybeum: where hauing re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surpris of Drepanum, a Citie on the other 50 side of the Bay of Lilybeum. This seruice the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull imbarques his troups, and arriues on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Asherbalis Gouvernour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arriued at Lilybeum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but hauing recovered his spirits, hee perswades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroad, than to be inclosed. Herewithall hee promiseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserue them; offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Confull, deceived of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his aduantage, and forceth the Confull into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himselfe, hauing the land on his back: hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roume, so frightened, as hee could not turne himselfe any way 10 from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when hee found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, besides his owne, and so fled away: all the rest of his fleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ships, were taken or sunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this seruice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiction and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great losse, arme threecore Gallies, with which they send away L. Iunius, their Confull, to take charge of their business in Sicily. Iunius arrives at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybaeum. One hundred and 20 twentie Gallies he had; and besides these, hee had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessarie provisions for the Armie. With this great fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he staies a while; partly to take in corne; partly to wait for some, that were too slow of saile, to keepe company with him along from Messana. In the meane time, hee dispatcheth away towards Lilybaeum, his Quaessors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their conuoy.

Adherbal was not carelesse, after his late victorie: but studied how to vse it to the best aduantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies hee deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had theefcore and ten 30 more vnder his owne charge; and sent him to trie, what good might be done against the Roman fleet, in the Hauen of Lilybaeum. According to this direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where he findes the Romans, more attentive to the keeping in of the besieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne against another fleet. So hee chargeth them, boords and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and hastens to the rescue. But Himilce, Gouvernour of the Towne, is not behind hand; who sallies out at the same time, and putting the Romans in great distrust, giues Carthalo good leisure to go through with his enterprise.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coast of Sicily, deuising how 40 to worke mischief to the enemy: wherein Fortune presented him with a faire occasion, which he wisely managed. He was aduertised by his Scouts, that they had descried, neere at hand, a great fleet, consisting of all manner of Vessells. These were the victuallers, which the Confull Iunius, more hastily than providently, had sent before him towards Lilybaeum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their coming: for hee and his men were full of courage, by reason of their late victories. Accompanying therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approaching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make strong opposition, he hastens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to seeke shelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder couert of a poore Towne, 50 belonging to their parties: that could helpe to saue them only from the present danger, by lending them engines and other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that assailed them. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a few of them, lay waiting for the rest, that could not long ride vnder those rocks, but wvould be forced, by

by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to saue their men, how they could, by taking land, with the losse of all their shipping. Whilest he was builed in this care; the Confull Iunius drew neere, and was discouered. Against him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Confull had neither means to flie, nor abilitie to fight. Therefore he likewise ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger so great, as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian, seeing this, betakes himselfe to a Station betwene the two Roman Fleets; where hee watcheth, to see which of them would first stirre, with a resolution to affalt that, which 10 should first dare to put it selfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coast of Sicily, betwene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybaeum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde stormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempest, and their signes, finding (belike) some swelling billow (for so we doe in the West of England, before a Southerly storme) hastened to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themselves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauigate, and neuer found any foule weather in the entrailes of their beaks, their Soothsayers being all land-prophets, were suddenly over-taken with a boisterous South winde, and all their Gallies forced against the rocks, and vterly wrackt.

20 This calamitie so discouraged the Romans, that they resolu'd againe to forsake the Seas, and trust onely to the seruice of their Legions vpon firme ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make warre in any Island, against those that haue a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misaduentures and miseries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian Discoveries. Yet persisting in their enterprises, with an invincible constancie, they haue annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Prouinces, as burie the remembrance 30 of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of discases, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, haue bene the enemies, wherewith every one of their most noble Discoverers, at one time or other, hath encountered. Many yeeres haue passed ouer some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more then one or two, haue spent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift vndertakers, haue not bene dishearted. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries, and Paradises, which they enjoy; and 40 well they deserue to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recovered by AMILCAR, who stoutly holds warre with them five yeeres. The Romans having emptied their common treasure, build a new fleet, at the charges of private men. The great victorie at Sea of LVCATIVS the Consull, whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crasse peace. The conditions of the peace betwene Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybaeum, and seekte to make sure to themselves all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring reliefe. The Consull Iunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which hee had received, bethought him what enterprise to vndertake. In the end hee resolved to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Iland; and of these, by cunning or treason, hee got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betwene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were verie defensible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, surnamed Bardae, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleet and armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italie, did thoroughly repay the spoiles which the Romans made in Africa. For hee first of all waited and destroyed the Territories of the Leontines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred hee into Sicily; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that served fitly to infect the Romans, hee occupied a peece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betwene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized vpon, was not only very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him opportunitie, to scoure all the coast of Italie with his fleet, waiting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Ile of Sicily hee held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeeres abode hee did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemy could neuer bee drawne to hazard the maine chance. Having wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, hee vndertooke a strange peece of worke at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very strongly lodged. Neuertheless Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-side, by which hee conueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the middell of the ascent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to passe, that the Romans which kept the top of the Mountaine, were streightly held (as it were) besieged. And no lesse was Amilcar himselfe restrained, by both of these Garrisons, and such as came to relieue them. There hee found them pastime about two yeeres more; hoping still to wearie out those that lay over his head, as they on the contrarie did their best, to thrust him out of those quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the prosecuting of this businesse at Eryx. Wherein it seemes true (as Hannibal, in Livy, spake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer stood in better termes, since the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans mans had vnto this forsaken the Seas, partly by reason of their great losses; partly vpon confidence of their land-forces, which they held resistlesse; Amilcar, with a small Armie, had so well acquitted himselfe, to the honour of his Countrey, that by the triall of five yeeres warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equall, if not superiour to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had beene deuiled and gone, for the dislodging of this obdurate Warriour: no way seemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; whereby, if the mastery of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of supply, should no longer be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficultie was found. The common treasure was exhausted: and the cost was not little, that was requisite vnto such an enterprise. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon private purses. Diuers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought so well, that they, whose abilitie would not serue to doe the like, joyined with some others, and haying their monie together, cocurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaid, when the warre was finished. By this voluntarie contribution, they made and furnished two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their patterne, that excellent swift-rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhadians, in the Port of Lilybaeum, as was shewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lucatius Catulus; who past with the same into Sicily, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum; inducours by all means to haue forced the Citie. But being aduertised that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand; and being mindfull of the late losses which his Predecessours had received; he was careful to put himselfe in order, against their arrivall.

Hanno was Admirall of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wise in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the arte of seeming reuerend. How his reputation was first bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, of things vndertaken by men more worthy than himselfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient sort, whose cold temper is averse from new enterprises, and therewithall an opinion of great fore-sight, confirmed by euery losse received. More particularly, hee was gracious among the people, for that hee was one of the most grievous oppressours of their subiect Prouinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall such hatred, as turned it all to their great losse. Hee had ere this bene employed against the Numidians, and wilde Africans, that were more like to Routers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of those fugitive Nations, hee learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great dishonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which lost not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counsaile, when, hauing shewed himselfe an unworthie Capitaine, hee tooke himselfe to the long Robe. Yet is hee much commended in Roman Histories, as a temperate man, and one that studied how to preserve the League betwene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deserved of his owne Countrey, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall hee was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his present voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miserable necessitie of accepting vpon hard conditions, that peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furnished his Nauie, with all needfull prouisions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the best of his qualities) but hee had neither bene carefull in traying his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with stout fellows. Hee thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpted Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the resistlesse force of tempests; than any other strength of opposition, had made them to forsake the Seas. Yet in one thing hee had other concerned conceiued a-right, or else was sent forth well instructed. It was his purpose, first of all to faile to Eryx, and there to discharge his ships of their lading: and hauing thus lightned himselfe, he meant to take aboard some part of the Land-armie, together with Amilcar himselfe, by whose helpe he doubted not, but that he should be able to make the enemie repent of his new aduerture to Sea. This was a good counsell, if it could haue beene performed. But Catulus vied all possible diligence, to prevent the execution of this deligne: not because hee was informed of the enemies purpose, but for that he knew it to be the best for them, and for that feared no danger so greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was desired; 10 yet he rather chose to fight with the enemie, that had the winde of him, than to suffer this conuoy to passe along to Eryx, vpon vnlikely hope of better opportunitie in the future. All that Hanno should haue done, Catulus had performed. Hee had carefully exercised his men in Rowing; hee had lightned his Gallies of all vnnecessarie burthen; and hee had taken aboard the choice men of the Roman Land-fouldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the first encounter, were vterly broken and defeated; hauing fiftie of their Gallies stemmed and sunke, and seuentie taken, wherein were few lesse than ten thousand men, that were all made prisoners: the rest, by a sudden change of winde, escaping to the Ile of Hieronefus. 20

The state of Carthage, vterly discouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to resolve. Meanes to repaire their fleet in any time there were none left; their best men of warre by Sea were consumed; and Amilcar, vpon whose valour and iudgement the honour and safetie of the Common-weale rested, was now surrounded by his enemies in Sicily, where hee could not bee relieved. In this extremitie, they make dispatch vnto Amilcar himselfe, and authorize him to take what course he should seeme best vnto his excellent wisdom, leaving all conclusions to his election and sole counsaile.

Amilcar, whom no aduersitie, accompanied with the least hope or possibilitie of recouerie, had euer vanquished, looking ouer every promise, true or false, that the present time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future hee was not able) resolved to make triall, whether his necessitie might bee compounded vpon any reasonable termes. He therefore sent to Lutatius the Confull an Overture of peace: who considering it well, gathered so many arguments from the present pouertie of the Roman State, waisted beyond expectation in the former warre, that he willingly harkened vnto it. So, in conclusion, an accord was made, but with prouision, That it should hold none otherwise, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearly abandon the Ile of Sicily. Secondly, that they should neuer vnder-take vpon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at libertie, and send back into Italy, all the Romans, whom they hold prisoners, without ranfome. Lastly, that they should pay vnto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirtene hundred and twentie thousand crownes: the same to be deliuered within twentie yeeres next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not thoroughly approved: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicily, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former summe; and required a 50 shorter time of payment. Further also, they tooke order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicily it selfe, but should also with-draw their Companies out of all the other Ilands betwene it and Italy, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such

Such was the end of the first Punicke Warre; that had lasted about twentie foure yeares without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwrack, about seuen hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about five hundred: the greatnesse of which losses, doth serue to proue the greatnesse both of these two Cities, and of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the iudgement of Polyins, That the Romans, in general, did shew themselves the brauer Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthie Capitaine.

CHAP. II.

Of diuers actions passing betwene the first and second Punicke Warres.

§. I.

Of the cruell warre begonne betwene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercenaries.

THE Romans, hauing partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicily, and all the little Ilands therunto adjacent, gaue them rather meanes and leisure to helpe themselves in a following warre, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is a true rule, Quod leges a victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur a victis. That lawes are given by the Conquerors, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made vnto them, by one of the Priuerates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this waightie business. For when one of Priuerum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present aduantage once them; he answered in 40 these words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidem & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam. If the peace be good and faithfull that you give vs, it will be perpetual; if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answer, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was said, *Viri & liberi vocem auditis; an credit posse, vllum populum, aut hominem deniq; in ea condicione, cuius eum pœnitet, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who could beleue, that any people, or indeede any one man, would continue longer in an oner-burdened estate, than mere necessity did enforce? Now if the Romans themselves could make this iudgement, of those Nations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to defend their liberties; surely, they grossly flattered themselves, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, 50 who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferior vnto themselves, would sit downe any longer by the losse and dishonour received, than vntill they could recouer their legs, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publique States, haue more pretailed, than by any proper prowesse or vertue, with.*

with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For after that the first Punicke Warre was ended; Amilcar, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence most conveniently the Armie might be transported into Africk: the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gisco, to whom, as to a man of approued sufficiencie, he deliuered ouer his charge. Gisco had an especiall consideration of the great summes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great disability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time; that so the first might haue their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arrived. Herein hee dealt prouidently. For it had not bene hard to perswade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common Treasurie did require: so that the first might haue bene friendly discharged, and a good president left vnto the second and third, whilst their delinquency had made them vnablen to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would be contented to gratifie the Publique state, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and hoped by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detayned the first and second companies; telling them, that they would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to some other place where they might be lesse troublesome. This must be done by some colourable words of perswasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicca: receiuing euery one a peece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while. This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers beginne to dislodge; leaving behinde them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fauour to their returning into the Townes; and therefore compell them to trusse vp their fardells, that they might haue none occasion left, to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellows arriuall, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to doe, and therefore might easily be drawne to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should be, when all their money came in; how much would fall to euery single share; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, euen beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, as so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away; vntill the whole Armie being arriued, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So thinke they all; and assemble themselves to heare what good newes this messenger had brought: with a full resolution to help his memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made vnto them; all which were to be considered in their Donatius. Hanno begins a verie formall Oration; wherein he bewailes the pouertie of Carthage; tells them, how great a summe of money is to be paid vnto the Romans; reckons vp the excessive charges, charges, whereas the common-wealth had bene in the late warre; and finally desires them to hold themselves contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they bare vnto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gauls, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceiued the whole tenour of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad men, so that nothing would serue to appease them. Hanno would faine haue liked away their furie, but he knew not how: for hee lesse vnderstood their dissonant lowde noises, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of many countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred vp to mutinie, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe, is to vse the helpe of Interpreters, and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meanings; some, for want of skill; others, of set purpose; and such as deliuer his errands in the worst sense, are best beleueed. Finally, they thinke themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolute to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer distance. In this mood they leaue Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a little of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their one errour. It is a good rule,

Fortibus & miseris.*

Haue speciall care, that valiant pouertie
Be not opprest with too great iniurie.

But this proud citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath also bene carelesse in promising to secure her selfe against the inconuenience that might followe. She had suffered the whole multitude, whereunto shee was like to giue cause of discontent, to ioyne it selfe into one bodie, when the severall troupes might easily haue bene dispersed: shee hath turned out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of these poore men, which had shee retained in shew of kindnesse, shee might haue vsed them as Hostages, for her owne safetie; and by employing a miserable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of warre, shee hath weakened the reputation of her bravest Captaines, that might best haue serued to free her from the threatening danger. Yet likely enough it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be vsed as an instrument in defrauding his owne souldiours of their wages: especially considering, that as he best could beare witness of their merits, so was hee not ignorant, that meane to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had bene willing thereunto. Here to may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldnesse to impose the blame of his owne wretched counsaile, vpon the liberrall promises made by the Captaines. Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to haue the managing of their own plot, and to deale the cards which themselves had shuffled. Thus they continue to doe as foolishly, as they had at first begun. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the souldiours; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send euer and anon some of their Senators into the Campe; who promise to satisfie all demands, as farre forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreme to another, they make the souldiours vnderstand, into what feare the City was driuen; which cannot but add much insolency to the passions already stirred vp.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the

Armie,

Armie, which thereupon grows wife, and finding the season fit, labours to make a great haruest. Monie must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue lost their horses, in publique seruice of the state. The state shall pay for them. They had liued some yeares, by making hard shift, without receiuing their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in provision; or their Capitaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not serue. They said that they had bene sometimes driuen to buy; and that (since they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their provision, during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that wheat had borne, whilst the warre lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might easily haue bene satisfied with farre lesse charges, and farre more honour, by receiuing their due at the first. But now they make none end of craving. For whilst the Carthaginians are perplexed, about this come monie; the Souldiers haue deuised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater summe of monie, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found of these controuersies which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sich, should be chosen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie consented, and made choise of Gefeo: partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himselfe at all times a friendly man to them, and careful of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africk: partly out of a dislike which they had conceived of Amilcar; for that he had not visited them in all this busie time. So Gefeo comes among them, and to please them the better, comes not without monie: which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calles vnto him first of all, the Capitaines, and then, the seuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had passed; aduising them temperately concerning the present; and exhorting them to continue their ieu vnto the State, which had long entertained them, and would alwaies be mindfull of their good seruices. After this he beganne to put hand to his purse: offering to giue them their whole paie in hand; and then after to consider of other reckonings, at a more convenient time. This he had bene well accepted, and might haue serued to bring all to a quiet passe; if two feditious ring-leaders of the multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a sturdie fellowe, and audacious, but a slave; that in the late warre had fled from a Roman whom hee seru'd, and therefore stood in feare, lest he should be deliuered backe to his Master; at whose hands he could expect no lesse, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by railing such troubles as might serue to withdraw men from care of priuate matters, and make his owne restitution impossible, were his Master neuer so importunate. With Spendius there associated himselfe one Matho; an hote-headed man, that had bene so forward in stirring vp the tumult, as hee could not chooseth but feare, lest his owne death should be made an example, to deterre others from the like feditious behaviour. This Matho deales with his Countermen, the Africans; telling them, that they were in farre worse condition, than either the Gauls, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any forercyne mercenaries. For (saith he) these our companions haue no more to doe, than to receiue their wages, and so get them gone: but wee, that are to stay behinde in Africa, shall be called to another manner of accompt, when wee are left alone; so that we shall haue cause to wisht, that wee had returned home beggers, rather than laden with the monie, which (little though it be) shall breake our backs. Wee are not ignorant, how tyrannically these our haughtie Masters of CARTHAGE doe reigne over vs. They thinke it reasonable, that our liues and goods should be at their disposition; which they haue at other times bene accustomed to take away from vs, even without apparent cause, as it were to declare their Soueraigntie: what will they now doe, seeing that we haue demeaned our selues as free men, and bene bold to set a good face on the matter, demanding our owne, as others haue done? Ye all doe know, that it were a very shame for vs, if by suing bene as fowle in curie danger of warre, as any other men, we should now stand quaking like slauers, and not dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This notwithstanding yet may assure your selues, that we are like to be taught better manners, as fooles as our selues are gone: in regard of whom they are contented to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let vs therefore be wise, and consider, that they hate and feare vs. Their hatred will shew it selfe, when their feare is once past: wileste wee now take our time, and whilst we are the stronger, sensible them so greivous, that their hatred shall not be able to doe vs wrong. All their strength consisteth in monie, wherewithall they haue hired others against vs, and vs against others. At the present they haue neither monie nor friends. The best A mie that euer serued them, wherof wee are no small part, lies at their gate, ready to helpe vs if we be men. A better opportunitie cannot be expected: for were our swords once drawne, all AFRICK would rise on our side. As for the CARTHAGINIANS, whither can they send for helpe? The case it selfe is plaine: but we must quickly reioice. Either we must prevent the diligence of GESCO, by incensing these GAULES and SPANIARDS, and procuring them to drawe blood, or elsse he becometh vs to please our good masters, by ioyning with them against our fellowes, yea by offering to iorgine vnto them all our wages, if so (peradventure) they may be wonne to iorgine vs, or not oueraciously to punish our faults already committed. Hee is worthily a wretched slave, that neither hath care to winne his Masters loue, nor courage to attempt his owne libertie.

By such persuasions Matho winnes the Africans souldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now so greedy of monie, as of quarell; which hee that seeks, will not misse to finde. When Gefeo therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horses and victuals to some other more convenient time; they brake into great outrage, and say that they will haue all, euen all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Matho and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting, to adde more fuel to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the onely men to whom the souldiours will hearken: if any other stand vp to make a speech, a shew of stones, flying about his eares, puts him to silence, that hee shall neuer afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath bene said already by these good spokersmen; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can bee heard, save onely thraue, thraue.

Now the Rebellion beginnes to take forme. Matho and Spendius are chosen Capitaines; who, followed by a desperate crew of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, vnder faire pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Gefeo is not wanting to the good of his countrie, but aduentsures himselfe vpon their furie. One while hee deales with the Capitaines, and other principall men; taking them by the hand, and giuing gentle words: another while hee workes with the seuerall Nations; putting them all in hope of their owne hearts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so fullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had fo good cause. They require him peremptorilie, to giue them their owne, and not to feed them with wordes. The truth is, that they are not so couetous as they seeme: but will be more glad of an ill answer, then of a good payment. This is more then Gefeo knows: hee is not that Matho hath, any more then bare words, to bestow vpon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconsiderate heat, hee telles them, That they may doe well, if they stand in want of monie, to seeke it of their Capitaine, Matho. This is enough, Shall hee both defraud them & deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon the treasure that he had brought; yea vpon him also, and al that are with him:

as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Matbo and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellows beginne to grow calme, by his faire language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde; that so the Armie may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treason. After this followes open warre. Matbo sollicites all Africk; and his Embassadours are euerie where well entertained. Neither is it needfull to vnderstand: the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to drawe the whole countrie into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions, with which they haue plagued others. It is true that aduersitie hath neuer bene vtold of her errors: and as she is euer assured to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne she vndergoes those of other men. The Africans, finding the Carthaginians hang vnder the wheele, tell them boldly, that their Impositions were mercilesse; that they tooke from them the one halfe of their cornes; that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted vpon their vassals the greatest punishments for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselves haue forgotten: but the people, that haue suffered so much, retaine all in perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely such as can beare armes, are ready to doe seruice in this great Commotion; but the very women bring forth their iewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for maintenance of so iusta quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, Matbo and Spendius are supplied with a strong aide of threecore and tenne thousand Africans: and are moreouer furnished with monie, not onely to satisfie the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the warre begun, though it should be of long endurance.

Diners obseruations vpon this warre with the mercenaries.

† I.

Of Tyrannie, and how tyrants are driven to vse helpe of mercenaries.

Here let vs rest awhile, as in a conuenient breathing place: whence wee may take prospect of the subiect, ouer which we trauaile. Behold a tyrannicall Citie, persecuted by her owne mercenaries with a deadly warre. It is a common thing, as being almost necessarie, that a tyrannie should be upheld by mercinarie forces: it is common, that mercenaries should be false: and it is common, that all warre made against Tyrants, should be exceeding full of hate and crueltye. Yet wee seldome heare, that the ruine of a Tyrannie is procured or fought, by those that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and seldome or neuer doe we reade of any warre, that hath bene prosecuted with such inextinguishable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyrannie, is a violent forme of government, not respecting the good of the subiect, but onely the pleasure of the Commander. I purposely forbore to say, that it is the vniuersall rule of one ouer many: for verie truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Albians, that their dominion ouer their subiects, was none other than a meere tyranny: though it were so, that they themselves were a great were a great Citie, and a popular estate. Neither is it peraduenture greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily bee conceiued, that no man willingly performs obedience, to one regardless of his life and welfare; vniuersally himselfe bee either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for some Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very slaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend to himselfe, vnto notice of the difference which might bee found betwene the worth of seuerall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to bee restrained with any limits of respect. Why should hee seeke out bounds, to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that hee hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, hee should haue riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deale from euery one: but euery one could haue spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, and now he hath enough: but (as Cicero saith) he is neuer satisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a stock, though it were indeede a good yearely Income. Therefore he deuileth new tricks of robbery, and is not better pleased with the gaine, then with the Art of getting. He is hated for this; and he knows it well: but hee thinks by crueltye to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none vnjustly, he may be said to deale craftily; but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any Conspirator to stand in feare, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore hee can thinke vpon none other securitie, than to disarme all his Subiects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire as many lustie Souldiers as shall be thought sufficient. These must not bee of his owne Countrey: for if not euery one, yet some one or other might chance to haue a feeling of the publique miserie. This considered, he allureth vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vn honest that can bee found; such as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be careful to support him, by whose onely fauour they are maintained. Now lest any of these, either by detection of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth giue, should be drawne to doe as he doth; to robbe, to rauenish, to murder, and to satisfie their owne appetites, in most outrageous manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more hee sees them grow hatefull to all men else. Considering in what Age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some English-man perhaps that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this lease, might suppose this discourse to be little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in need of mercinarie Souldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmly assured vnto the Tyrant.

† II.

†. II.

That the tyrannie of a Citie ouer her Subiects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and that a tyrannicall Citie must likewise vse mercenary Souldiers.

NOW concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subiects; it may appeare more wailes to be more moderate, then that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life: the lesse neede hath shee therefore, to secure her selfe by crueltie. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures; and therefore needes the lesse, to pluck from her Subiects. If warre, or any other great occasion, drive her to necessitie, of taking from her Subiects more than ordinarie summes of monie: the same necessitie makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeede, no wrongs are so gricuous and hartfull, as those that are insolent. Remember (saith Caligula the Emperor, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may doe what I list, and to whom I list: these wordes were accounted horrible, though he did her no harme. And Iuuenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her slaues; that whilest shee was whipping them, she painted her face, talked with her Gossips, and vsed all signes of neglecting what those wretches felt. Now seeing that the greatest grieuances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subiects, are free from all fence of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although desire of libertie make them wearie of her Empire. In these respects it is not needefull, that shee should keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throtes, and maintaine them in all villanie, as a Dionysius or Agathocles must doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serue to proue, That a Citie is scarce able to deserue the name of a Tyrannesse, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appeare, That the miseries, wherewith a Tyrant lodeth his people, are not so heauie, as the burdens imposed by a cruel Citie. Not without some apparence of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other priuate passions, are no way incident to a Citie or Corporation. But to make this good, wee shall haue neede to vse the helpe of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lasciuious, when Cato was faine to rise and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his grauitie, might not hinder the people, from calling for a shew of naked Courtians, that were to be brought vpon the open stage? By common practice, & generall approved custome, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the priuate vertue or vice of any one man; nor by metaphysicall abstraction of the vniuersall from the singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded. I say therefore (as I haue said elsewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one pernicious Tyrant, then vnder many thousands. The reasons, proving this, are too many to set downe: but few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soeuer, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good aduice, yea, or some vnexpected accident, may reforme him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his successor may proue better. Many Tyrants haue beene changed into worthie Kings: and many haue ill vsed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becoming hereditarie to their posteritie, hath growne into the most excellent forme of Government, euen so a lawfull Monarchie. But they that liue vnder a tyrannicall Citie, haue no such hope: their Mistress is immortal, and will not slacken the reins, vntill they be pulled out of her hands; and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightie Chariotier. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them lesse mindfull

of the future. New flies, and hungrie ones, fall vpon the same fore, out of which, others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home empty to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and honie. These flies into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with euery mans wealth, or whatsoeuer else, in all the Prouince, is worthie to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becoming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these malicious guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endlesse labour (yet it must be vndergone) and such as euery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what auaileth it? The loue of one Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successour of this man, he is more loving than could be witheld, in respect of a faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrarie faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seekes the ruine of all that haue beene inward with them. So the miseries of this tyrannie are not simple; but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or Of Recouerie, against extorting Magistrates: yet wee finde, that it serued not wholly to restrain their Prouinciall Governours; who presuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Prouinces, to worke all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for feare of judgement. If the subjects of Rome groned vnder such oppressions; what must we thinke of those, that were vassalls vnto Carthage? The Romans impoled no burthen some tributes; they loued not to heare, that their Empire was gricuous; they condemned many noble Citizens, for hauing bene ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrarie: the rapines newly deuised by one Magistrate, serued as prebends to instruct another; euery man resolved to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and he was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had bene such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice, are not extant: the gouernement of Verres the Roman, in Sicill, that is liuely set out by Tullie, may serue to informe vs, what was the demerour of these Punicke Rulers, who stood in feare of no such condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By prosecuting this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Proposition; That a Citie cannot gouerne her subject Prouinces so mildly, as a King; but it is enough to haue shewed, That the tyrannie of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Suteable to the crueltie of such Lords, is the hatred of their subjects; and againe, suteable to the hatred of the subjects, is the jealousy of their Lords. Hence it followed, that in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vse the seruice of African Souldiers; in Africke it selfe, they had rather bee beholding to others, than were farther fetched. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punicke Warre, blisse his mercenaries out of their owne Countreys; vt Afri in Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melior proci ab domo futurus vterq; miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati stipendia facerent; That the Africans might serue in Spain, the Spaniards in Africke, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutual pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African, and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subiect vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by dutie. Yet seeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere desire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand vpon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the use of mercinarie Souldiers, and forraigne Auxiliaries.

THe extreme danger, growing from the imployment of such Souldiers, is well obserued by Machiavel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaitfull, disobedient, deuours, and destroyers of all places and countries, wherinto they are drawne; as being held by no other bond, than their owne commoditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they haue often, and in time of great extremitie, not only refused to fight, in their defence, who haue entertained them, but reuolted vnto the contrarie part; to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that haue trusted them. These Mercinaries (saith Machiavel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eighth of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King wonne the Realme of Naples, with his Buckler without a sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queene Ioane of Naples, abandoned her seruice on the sudden; and forced her to put her selfe into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first 20 of that race Duke of Millan: who, being entertained by the Milanese, forced them to become his slaves; euen with the same Armie which themselves had leied for their owne defence. But Lodewick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the iust judgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in loosing his whole estate by the trecherie of such faithlesse Mercinaries, as his owne father had bene. For, hauing waged an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Duchie, together with his person, into their hands; he was by them deliuered vp vnto his enemy the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches to his dying day.

The like inconuenience is found, in vsing the helpe of forraigne Auxiliaries. We 30 see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turkes, against his neighbour Princes; he could neuer, either by perswasion or force, set them againe ouer Sea vpon Asia side: which gaue beginning to the Christian seruitude, that soone after followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, fought aide of the great Demetrius; but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander, who had inuited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracus the Turke was called into Egypt by Sanar the Soldan, against his Oppolite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Egypt, that Saladine his Successour became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soone after. What neede we looke out for examples of this kinde? Euery Kingdome, in effect, can furnish vs. The Brittaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland: but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

Against all this may be alleadged, the good successe of the vnited Prouinces of the Netherlands, vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeede these Low Countries haue many goodly and strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Seamen and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they haue seldome bene able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessitie therefore compelled them to seeke helpe abroad: and the like 40 necessitie made them forbear to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with monie raised by their Trade, they maintained the warre: and therefore could ill spare, vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped well. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilst they had none other than mercinarie Souldiers. Many huttlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witnesse it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowick of Nassau, felt it to his griefe, in his retrait from Greeninghen, when in the very instant, that required their seruice in fight, his mercinaries cried out aloud for monie, and so ranne away. This was not the only time, when the hired souldiers of the States, haue either fought to hide their cowardize vnder a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by meeke couetousnesse, haue ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths, I will not stand to proue this by many examples: for they themselves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monseur 10 the Duke of Amica, brother to the French King; saue that it is follie to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraigne Auxiliaries, needeth no better pattern. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselves Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall we meet with such another as this Monseur, who, for his protection promised, being rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrie, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples neck? Well, hee liued to repent it, with griefe enough. Euen whilst he was counteruiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginarie sorrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as 20 verily beleecing the Towne to bee surprisid and wonne; the death of the Count St. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne troupes, informed him better what had hapned; shewing that they were his owne French, who stood in neede of pittie. Then was his fained passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of minde; wherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Aleas, mon Dieu, que veulx tu faire de moy; Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not serue to proue, that there is litle danger in vsing mercinarie souldiers, or the help of forraigne Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding they were obedient vnto necessitie, and sought helpe 30 of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Soueraignie of their Countrie, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continuall warre; when the heire of England reigned in Scotland, a King too iust and wise (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to helpe those that had attempted the conquest of his owne inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very safely repose confidence, in the forces of these their Neighbour-Countries. The souldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit many other commendations) not only regardfull of the pay that they should receiue; but well affected vnto the cause that they tooke in hand: or if any were cold in his deuotion, to the side whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order, 40 by remembrance of his owne home, where the English would haue rewarded him with death, if his faith had bene corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitie of the poorer sort was relieued, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, injurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Countrie, of the same Religion, and to which they all are louingly affected: then may such a Countrie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other businesse, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may 50 well hold true in general: That mercinarie, and forraigne auxilinarie forces, are no lesse dangerous, than the enemy, against whom they are entertained.

†. IIII.

†. IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans gave them assurance to use the service of their owne subjects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the use and benefit of the like moderation.

Here may it be considered, whether also the Romans were not compelled to use service of other souldiours in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne citizens? for if it were their manner to arme their owne subjects; how happened it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they avoid the inconveniences above rehearsed? The answer is; That their Armies were compounded vually of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equal number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of the Campanians, Hetrurians, Sannites, or other of their subjects, as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times, (though seldom they did imploy so many,) ten Roman Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had beene wanting; which serued to keepe in good order their subjects, that were alwaies fewer in the Army than themselves. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priuiledges and immunities, which they enjoyed, made them assured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they liued almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soeuer, seemes troublefome to the necke that hath beene accustomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of seuerall advantages, to deliuer themselves from the Roman subjection. But still they haue beene reclaimed by warre; the Authors of rebellion haue sharply punished; and the people, by degrees, haue obtained such libertie, as made them esteeme none other wise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italie. Yes, in proceesse of time it was granted vnto many cities, and those farre off removed, euen to Tarsus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne, That all the Burgeses should be free of Rome it selfe. This fauour was conferred absolutely vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subjects halfe of their tribute which they had beene wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a readie way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the reuiue of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking inuouation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good government, That when some, for their well-deferuing, haue had the offer to be made citizens of Rome; they haue refused it, and held themselves better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Petellia, a citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to endure all extremitie of warre, than vpon any condition, to forsake the Romans, euen when the Romans themselves had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subjects, and therefore willed them to looke to their owne good, as hauing beene faithfull to the vrmost. Such loue purchased these milde Governours, without impairing their Maiestie thereby. The summe of all is: They had, of their owne, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning therunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as neede required, with other helpe of their owne subjects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prospectie of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate use of souereigne power being so effectual, in assuring the people vnto their Lords, and consequentlie, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion: it may seeme strange, that the practice of tyrannie, whose effects are contrary, hath beene so common in all ages. The like, I know, may bee said, of all Vice,

Liv. Dec. 3. 4.

Liv. Ibid.

and Irregularitie whatsoeuer. For it is lesse difficult (whatsoeuer thinke otherwise) and more safe, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honestie, than to turne aside from it; yet commonly our passions lead vs into by-patches. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason, the same vniuersitie appeare either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least will take away all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is not so: for as much as we can hardly deterie the passion, that is of force to inordinate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Government. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seldom beene hereditarie, or long-lasting; but haue ended commonly with the Tyrants life, or sometimes before his death; by which means the Government hath beene reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That Tyrannies are of short continuance. But this doth not fauour the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? why did the Albanians? why haue many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection, wherein so many thousand citizens, diuided and subdiuided within themselves by factions, did all concur, notwithstanding the much diuersitie of temper, and the vehemencie of private hatred among them? Doubtles, we must be faine to say, That Tyrannies, by 20 it selfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt, euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankind, are common likewise vnto brut beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are giuen by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other Affections are likewise natural, in convenient measure, both vnto Mankind, and to all creatures that haue sense, for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: euen so is this desire of ruling or obeying, engrained by 30 Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuile forme of iustice. All these in bred qualities are good and vsfull. Neuertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttonie and Drunkenesse, which, in reproach, are called beastlie, by an vnproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthie creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions as descend no lower than vnto brut beasts, are held lesse vile; and perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grievously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice 40 more hurtfull vnto Mankind, than that which issueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraued Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefs, of which hath beene an old question in dispute, whether bee the worse; That all things, or That nothing, should be lawfull. Of these a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrarie dis Temper, whose vehemencie the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremitie of either, no countrie is able to subsist: yet the defectiue dulnesse, that permitteeth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessitie doth enforce the ordinarie Magistracie; whereas Tyrannie is more actiue, and pleaseth it selfe in the excess, with a false colour of iustice. Examples of stupiditie, and vnaptnes to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are euery where found: for this qualitie troubles not it selfe in seeking Empires; or if by some error of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Cleaudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also cruelitie doth helpe 50

Arist. Polit. lib. 5. c. 12.

to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknowne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowne, but would be reputed honourable: for it is propter vim & felix scelus, a fortunate mischief, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith PETER CHARRON) assigned to those, that know how to increase, or to preserve humane nature: all honours, greatness, riches, dignities, empires, triumphs, trophies, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, or destroy it. CAESAR, and ALEXANDER, haue vn-made and slaine, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the error of Mans iudgement, in valuing things according to common opinion. But the true name of Tyrannie, when it growes to ripenesse, is none other, than Feritie: the fame that Aristotle saith to be worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, issuing from the Passions incident both to Man, and Beast; no lesse than Periurie, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, excede in villanie, the faults of Gluttonie and drunkennesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and Pitycampes, that vsed their bodily force to the destruction of Mankind, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius and Agathodes, whose mischievous heads were afflicted by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference betweene Freemen, and slaves.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simple, allowable and good. The former of these, is, as the dominion of Reason ouer Appetite: the latter is the whole authoritie, which one free man can haue ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which hee that knowes what the power of a Father is, or ought to bee, knowes to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Maisterlike rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when he said; Haue dominion ouer the fish of the Sea, and ouer the fowle of the aire, and ouer euery liuing thing that moueth vpon the earth: which also hee confirmed vnto Noah, and his children, saying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, shall be vpon euery beast of the earth, and vpon euery fowle of the aire, vpon all that moueth vpon the earth, and vpon all the fishes of the Sea, into your hands are they deliuered. Hee who gaue this dominion to Man, gaue also an aptitude to vse it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a great part of Mankind. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disability to gouerne themselves, proues them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to be naturallie slaves.

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppress men with bondage: vnlesse the lawfulness thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shal not be punished for the death of a seruant, whom he hath slaine by correction, if the seruant liue a day or two, because he is his monie; or else by the captiuitie of the Midianitish giles, which were made bond-slaves, and the Sanctuarie had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtlesse the custome hath bene very ancient: for Noah laid this curse vpon Canaan, that hee should be a seruant of seruants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-seruants, and maide-seruants, which were none other than slaves. Christian Religion is said to haue abrogated this olde kinde of seruilitie: but surely, they are decieued, that thinke so. Saint Paul desired the libertie of Onesimus, whome he had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote hee for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, craving it as a benefite, not vrging it as a dutie. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giueth vnto seruants: Let euery man abide in the same calling wherein hee was called: art thou called, being a seruant? so care not for it, but if thou mayst be made free, vse it rather. It is true, that Christian Religion hath procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in feare, of being discouered by their slaves, vnto the persecuters of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drew many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbade it, as vnlawfull, vnto his sectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; I saue that by the practice of the Turks and Moores, it comes he did not. In England we had many bond-seruants, vntill the times of our last ciuile warres: and I thinke that the Lawes concerning vilinage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaves were made free, which were of great vse and seruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurfes and other the like Trades; slaves in Nature, though not in Lawe.

But whether this kind of dominion be lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well proued, that it is naturall. And certainly wee finde not such a latitude of difference in any creature, as in the nature of man: wherein (to omit the infinite distance in estate of the elect & reprobate) the wisest excell the most foolish, by far greater degree, than the most foolish of men doth surpass the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Commiseration hath giuen way to Reason: we shall find that Nature is the ground euen of Masterly power, & of seruile obedience, which is thereto correspondent. But it may be truly said, that some countries haue subsisted long, without the vse of any seruilitie: as also it is true, that some countries haue not the vse of any tame cattell. Indeede the affections which vphold ciuill rule, are (though more noble) not so simple needfull, vnto the sustentation either of our kind, as are Lust, and the like; or of euery one, as are hunger and thirst; which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile, and seruile dispositions, haue libertie to shew themselves begging in the streets; there may wee more iustly wonder, how the dangerous toyle of sea-faring men can finde enough to vndertake them, than how the swarme of idle vagabonds should increase, by access of those, that are wearie of their owne more painefull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted euen by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: wherunto the generall custome of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in flatterers, that are the basest of slaves.

This being so, we finde no cause to maruaile, how Tyranny hath bene so rise in all ages, and practised, not onely in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but euer by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since, other vices haue likewise gotten head, and borne a generall sway; notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that haue vsed well the inferior Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not bee disordered? In the gouernment of wife and children, some are vterly carelesse, and corrupt all by their dull conuenance: others, by masterly rigour, hold their owne blood vnder condition of slavery. To be a good Gouernour is a rare commendation; and to preferre the Weale publike aboue all respects whatsoeuer, is the Vertue iustly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages afford not many examples. Hector is named by Aristotle, as one of them; and deservingly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, vsed in defence of a mans owne countrie. But if we consider, that a loue of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountain of all goodnesse: wee shall finde, that no Morall Vertue, how great soeuer, can, by it selfe, deserue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns herof; such as David, Iosaphat, and Iosias were. Of Christian Kings if there were many such, the world would soone be happie. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due; or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can finde a King, religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement either of aduersitie, or of some regard of state; a procurer of the general peace and quiet; who not onely vseth his authoritie, but addes the trauell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Iudges to doe iustice; by the vigorous influence of whose Gouernment, ciuilitie is infused, euen into those places, that haue bene the dennes of savage Robbers and Cutthrotes; one that hath quite abolished a slavish

Law,

Law, by which an whole Nation of his subiects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdom doth make the praise not onlie of Nobilitie and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the bloud, the wines, and the goods, of those that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appeare lesse regardable: he, I say, that can finde such a King, findeth an example, worthe to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder such a King, it is likelie by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknowne; that Ciuilitie and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subiects, shall cause the Nations farre off remoued, to wish him their Soueraigne. I neede not adde herunto, that all the actions of such a King, euen his bodilie exercises, doe partake of vertue; since all things tending to the preferuation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, seeketh how to imitate the vnspokeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible maiesie, with both of which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which hee procureth. Left any man should thinke me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bonds of reason; I adde herunto, that such a King is neuertheless a man must die, and may erre: yet wisdom and fame shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the helpe of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefite (though there be many other besides) redounding vnto this King, as the fruit of his goodnesse. The people that liue vnder a pleasant yoke, are not onely louing to their Soueraigne Lord, but free of courage, and no greater in mulier of men, then of stout fighters, if neede require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as ouer slaues, shall bee attended in time of needfullie, by slauish mindes, neither louing his person, nor regarding his or their owne honour. Cowards may bee furious, and slaues outrageous, for a time: but among spirits that haue once yielded vnto slaueerie, vniuersally it is found true, that Homer saith, God bercaueth a man of halfe his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage.

Hun. Odys. l. 17.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably haue spoken, in the generall discourse of Government: but where so liuely an example, of the calamitie following a tyrannicall rule, and the vse of Mercinaries, thereupon depending, did offer it selfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectfull, than being barely deliueed, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the warre against the Mercinaries was diuersly managed by HANNO and AMILCAR, with variable successe. The bloody consultations of the Mercinaries; and their final destruction.

BEing now to returne vnto those Mercinaries, from whome I haue thus farre digressed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seeketh their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercinaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all bene subiects vnto Carthage, then might they iustly haue bene termed Rebels: yet but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeouored to subuert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercinaries, as Polybius also doth.

These

These vnder the aduantage of their present strength, beseege Vitea, and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated vpon the western Hauon of Carthage, where it is diuided by a necke of land; Hippagreta standing inwards vpon the great Lake; Vitea further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunis abandoned, which lay fitlie to hinder the Carthaginians, from passing vp into the countrie: for Matbo and Spendius wanted not men, to followe the warre in all parts; at once.

Howe the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may conceiue. But the businesse it selfe awakes them hastilie. They are hardly prest on all sides; and therefore trauailed their braines to the vttermost, how to shake off these furious dogges from their shoul ders, who sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came vnto the very walles of their Citie. In this exigent Hanno was made their Generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatsoeuer was needfull, as well to relieue a Towne besieged, as to batter and assaile any place defended against him. With these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, hee came to Vitea; so suddenly, that the enemies as men surpris'd, forsooke their Trenches, and retired themselves vnto a rising peece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of his beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custom was, after any losse, to flie two or three whole daies iourne off; presently entred the Towne; to shew himselfe, after this his victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was to warre, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight againe, many times in one day, as need required, T herefore as soone as they perceiued, that hee knew not how to vse a victorie; they assailed their owne Campe, and with great slaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselves within Vitea; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno follo wed with futable indifferencie: loosing the benefit of many faire opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

The Carthaginians, perceiuing this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their shete-anchor; sending to the field their great Captaine, Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foote of supply, and seuentie Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he should be able to meet with the enemy vpon equall ground. For besides other places of aduantage that the Mercinaries had occupied, Hanno had suffered them to winne the only Bridge, by which the River Masra, or Bagradas, was passable vnto these, that were to trauaile into the Continent. This Riuer had not many fords, nor those easie for a single man to get ouer: but vpon them all was kept such guard, as gaue to Amilcar little hope of preuailing in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it selfe, Matbo and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Towne, wherein to lie commodiously, intente onely to the custodie thereof. But Amilcar had obserued, that the very mouth of Bagradas vied to be sometimes cloyed with sand and grauell, that was driven in by certaine customarie windes, & could not be driven out againe, by force of that slow Riuer, till the winde falling, or changing, suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channel. Hereof he made vse; and taking his opportunity, passed the Riuer; contrarie to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no neede to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come ouer Bagradas: all the Mercinaries were troubled with the newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improuident grauitie of Hanno, but with an able spirit, euen with their own Master in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was soone changed into presumption; when more than fiftene thousand of their owne societie, were come from Vitea; and other tenne thousand from the gard of the Bridge. Their Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne iudgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they refolued to charge him on all sides, and beate him downe, in despite of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attended vpon him; watching for some aduantage; and still exhorting one another to play the men, and giue the onset. Especially they that followed him in the Reare, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptnesse was such, as tooke from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himselfe on plaine grounds, that were fittest for the seruice of his Elephants, which hee placed in front of his Armie. Neither made hee shewe of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashnes of his enemies to increase, till it should brake into some disorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldnesse than good heed, they followed him so neere, as would bee little for their good; if hee should turne vpon them, he hastened his march, euen to such a pace, as made a shewe little differing from plaine flight. The Mercenaries presently fell vpon his skirts; belceuing, that for feare of them he was ready to runne away. But whilest they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victorie, were druing at the heeles of those that had the Reare; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotely, but in very good order, so that amazed with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this ouerthrowe, there were ixte thousand of the Mercenaries slaine, and about two thousand taken; the rest fled; some to the Campe at Vtica, others to the Towne at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he wanne the place easily: the enemies being thence also fled vnto Tunes, as not hauing recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victorie, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Townes reuolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to returne to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himselfe, in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africke, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or neuer to doe their best, for the recouerie of their freedome; hee perswaded Spendius, and Antaritus that was Captaine of the Gauls, to wait vpon Amilcar, and alwaies to keepe the higher grounds, or at least the foot of some hill, where they might be safe from the Elephants; and hee himselfe continued to presse the Towne of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessarie for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his businesse required, to take such waies as there were: for all the countrey lay not leuell. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, surrounded with hilles, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie; the same of Amilcar his personall worth did greatly benefit his countrey. For Naraulsus, a yong gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occasion seruing to get the acquaintance, and loue of so braue a man, which he much desired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, signifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all seruice. Amilcar ioyfully entertained this friend; promised vnto him his owne daughter in marriage; and so wanne from the enemies two thousand horse, that following Naraulsus turned vnto the Carthaginians side. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approue his owne valour, to his new friend. So the victorie was great: for there were slaine ten thousand of Spendius his fellows, and foure thousand taken prisoners, but Spendius himselfe, with Antaritus the Gauls, escaped to doe more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many, as were vnwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should neuer more beare arms against the Carthaginians; threatening to take sharpe reuenge vpon all, that should breake this Councant.

This humanitie was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Antaritus; as tending tending to winne from them, the hearts of their fouldiers. Wherefore they refolued to take such order, that not a man among them should dare, to truit in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safetie, whilest Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertisement, wherein was contained, that some of their company respectue onely of their priuate benefit, and careless of the generall good, had a purpose to betraie them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull, to looke well vnto Geseo, and his companions, whom these traitours had a purpose to enlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the fouldiours, exhorting them to fidelitie; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanitie of Amilcar, toward some, was none other than a baite, wherewith to entrap them all at once together; as also telling them, what a dangerous enemy Geseo would prouoe, if hee might escape their hands. While hee is yet in the midt of his tale; were letters come, to the same purpose. Then steps forth Antaritus and speakes his minde plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea the onely way, for the common safetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were desiring to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with those that had a care of the warre; that it were better to make an end of Geseo his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custodie; that by such a course euery one should be engaged in the present Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victorie alone; finally, that such as would speake here-against, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Antaritus was in great credit with the fouldiours, and could speake sundrie languages, in such sort, that hee was vnderstood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Geseo, and all the other prisoners, should forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuerthelesse there were some, that for loue of Geseo, sought to alter his intended crueltie; but they were forth with stoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and so the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian prisoners which they tooke, should be serued in like sort: and that the subiects or friends of Carthage, should lose their hands, and so be sent home: which rule they obserued euer afterwards.

Of this crueltie I need say no more, then that it was most execrable feritie. As for the counsaile of vsing it, it was like vnto the counsaile of ACHITOPHEL, All Israel shall heare, that thou art abhorred of thy fathers; then shall the hands of all that are with thee, be strong. Such are the fruits of desperation. He that is past all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to auoide the punishment of lesse offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull spirits of those that haue bene wronged, are breeders of this desperation: to which may be added, some deficiency of Lawes, in distinguishing the punishments of malefactors, according to the decree of their fœuerall crimes. A coward thinkes all prouision too little, for his owne securitie. If Ptolemæus be a coward (said the Emperour Mavritius); then is he neuer dæron. To be steadfast and sure, in taking reuenge; is thought a point of honour, and a satisfaction against new iniuries. But wrongfully: for it is oppositeto the rule of Christianitie; and such a qualitie discovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwise would haue repented, and sought to make amends, for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect euen their gentlenesse, as the introduction to extreme rigour. Like vnto the cruelties of Princes and Gouernours, are the cruelties of Lawes. (Where one and the same punishment, is awarded vnto the lesse offence, and vnto the greater, he that hath aduentured to robbe a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

Against these inconueniences Mercie and Seueritie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his owne fouldiours were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle cources; his humanitie

was readie to inuite them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honestie and shame, he rewarded their villanie with answerable vengeance; casting them vnto wilde beasts, to be deuoured.

Vntill this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himselfe apart from Amilcar, and done little, as may seeme, for that nothing is remembered of him, since his late losses. Neither was Amilcar forrie to want his helpe, as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremitie, as threatned utter ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, & came to Amilcar, with whom hee ioynd his forces. By this access of strength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more then in former times: rather he could now performe nothing; such was the hatred betwene him and his vnworthy Colleague. The Townes of Vitea and Hippagreta, that had stood alwaies firme on the Carthaginian partie, did now reuolt vnto the enemye, murdering all the souldiours that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The prouisions brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost in foule weather: and Carthage it selfe stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilest one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) binde the others hands.

It hath in all Ages bene vsed, as the safest course, to send forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities, Athens and Rome; which other States and Princes haue often imitated; perswading themselves, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excel each other, will vse the greater diligence. They haue also ioynd two chiefe Commanders in equall commission, vpon this further consideration; the better to restrain the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hercof all Common-weales haue bene ialous, hauing bene taught by their examples that haue made themselves Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that haue employed them. In this point, the Venetians haue bin so circumspect, as they haue for the most part, trusted strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, serueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them trust: but in manning the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres made neere vnto Rome it selfe, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph; which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could giue) was to be obtained by that one yeeres seruite; it is no maruaile, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end then victorie. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise then was desired, one Dilector was appointed, whose power was neither hindered by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indecde the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vnlesse one businesse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fitt to be ioined in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times preuaile with their ioynt Generals: yet was this neuer or seldome, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modestie hath often bene such, that the lesse able Capitaine, though of equall authoritie, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they haue many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armie, receiued great and most dangerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the second Punic warre we shall finde examples. On the contrarie side, in their warres most remote, that were alwaies mannaed by one, they seldome failed to winne exceeding honour, as hercafter shall appeare. Now of those tenne Generals, which serued the Athenians at the Battaille of Marathon, it may truly be said, that had not their temper been better, than the iudgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affaires had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicilie: the one being so ouer-warie, and the other so hallic, as all came to nought: that they vnderooke; whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, hauing sole charge of all, did their Countrie and Common-weale most remarkable seruite. For it is hard to finde two great Capitaines, of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of iudgement, and so the contrarie, by which the best occasions are as often ouerslpt, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably vnderaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Candy was slain after the Battaille of Iarnas, (which Prince, together with the Admirall Chysition, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an aduancement, than an hinderance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one, out-reach the aduisednesse of the other, as whatsoeuer the Admirall intended to winne by attending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to lose, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present busines: who, though they were still sicke of their ill-grounded loue to Hanno, and were vnwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armie that serued vnder them. The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Campe: which he did; and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar; and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better, Matho and Spendius had brought their Armie neere vnto the Citie; and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much; hauing in their Campe about fiftie thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neuertheless, the Citie was too strong for them to winne by assault: and the entrance of victualles they could not hinder, if any should bee sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicilie he assisted the Romans, and still continued in their Alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne, because if no other State gaue the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principalltie of Syracuse would soone be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some slender assistance, and for the present refused good offers made vnto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a kind of noble disposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the sequelle manifestly proued.

Whilest Matho and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligent, in waiting at their backs, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselves more straightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issue into the field: where Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Capitaine assisting the rebellion, take vpon them to finde Amilcar worke; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naransius, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plaines. Wherefore hee betooke himselfe to his former method of warre; keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the straightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might thinke it selfe, with little disadvantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could bee matched by the labour of Spendius. Hee drew the enemye to many skirmishes; in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day:

day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giuing them the ouerthrow in plaine battaile: vntill at length he got them into a straight, whence ere they should get out, he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough, to perceiue their owne disadvantage: and therefore they had the lesse stomake to fight; but awaited for helpe from Tunis. Amilear prudently foreseeing, that necessitie might teach them, to dare impossibilities. vsed the benefit of their present feare, and shut them close vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miserably for succour, that came not: and hauing spent all their vittualles, were so pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their prisoners. This they suffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deferred any fauour from Carthage; 10 and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not bee vnmindfull of them. But when they were driuen to such extremities, that they were faine to deuoure their owne companions, and yet saw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obstinacie was broken; and they threatened their Captaines with what they had deferred, vnlesse they would goe forth to Amilear, and seeke such peace as might be gotten. So Spentius, Zarxas, and Aulartus, fell to consultation, wherein it was resolved, to obey the multitude, and yeeld themselves, if it were so required, vnto the death, rather than to perish by the hands of their owne companions. Hereup- 20 on they lend to craue parle, which is granted; and these three come forth to take with Amilear in person. What they could say vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilear granted, it seemes that they tooke the blame vpon themselves, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians should choose, out of the whole number of these enemies, any ten whom they pleased, to remaine at their discretion; and that the rest should all be dismissed, each in his shirt, or in one single coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilear told these Ringleaders, that he chose them presently, as part of the ten, and so commanded to lay hands on them: the rest he forthwith went to fetch, with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon so gentle articles, thought themselves betraied: and therefore a- 30 mazedly ranne to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the same astonishment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilear both colour of iustice, in accomplishing reuenge, and ease in doing the execution. They were all slaine: being fortie thousand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the reuolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilear, with his Zarxasus and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeelde: Vtica, and Hippagreta, onely standing out, vpon feare of deferred vengeance; and Tunes, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe strength of 40 the enemy. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spentius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the walles; to terrifie those of his olde companions, that were still in armes. With this rigour the siege began; as if speedie victorie had beene assured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilear on the opposite side: too farre asunder to helpe one another in sudden accidents; and therefore it behoued each, to be the more circumspect.

Matho from the walles beheld his owne destinie, in the miserie of his companions, and knew not how to auoide it otherwise, than by a cast at dice with fortune. So he brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay secure, as if all 50 danger were past, vnder the command of Hannibal: and with so great and vnexpected furie he assailed, that after an exceeding slaughter, he tooke Hannibal prisoner; on whom, and thirtie the most noble of the Carthaginian prisoners, he presently reuenged the death of Spentius by the same torture. Of this Amilear knew nothing till till it was too late; neither had he strength enough remaining, after this great losse, to continue the siege; but was faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terror was no lesse within Carthage, vpon the fame of this losse; than had beene the ioy of the late great victorie. All that could beare armes, were sent into the field, vnder Hanno; whom, it seemes, they thought the most able of their Captaines foruiuing the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the imployment of one sole General, neere vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue trusted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this hastic 10 exigent, to deulse about repealing it. But thirtie principall men are chosen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilears campe, and by all good perswasions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It acerely touched Amilear in his honour, that the carelesnesse of Hannibal seemed to be imputed vnto him, by sending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Neuerthelesse after many conferences, the authoritie of the Senatours prevailed; Amilear and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilest this warre lasted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to followe good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly 20 hatred.

In the meane season Matho was come abroad; as meaning to vse the reputation 20 of his late successe, whilest it gaue some life vnto his businesse. He had reason to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilear. The skirmishes, and light exercies of warre, wherein Amilear trained his Carthaginians, did lo farre abate the strength, and withall diminish the credit of Matho, that he refused to trie the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his desires should be accomplished, or his cares ended. To this conclusion the Carthaginians were no lesse prone, than Matho; as being wearie of these long troubles, and insupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approued it selfe in many trials; and well assured of Amilear his great worth, whereunto the enemy had not what to oppose. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouision: inui- 30 ting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the fildie, all that lay in Garrison.

The issue of this Battaille might haue beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereto presume, save their daring spirits, which had beene well cooled by the many late skirmishes, wherein they had learned how to runne away. The Carthaginians had reason to dare, as ha- 40 uing often beene victorious: and in all points else they had the better of their enemies; especially (which is worth all the rest) they had such a Commander, as was not easily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the desire of libertie should worke so much, in men accustomed to seruitude, as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whose future and present good lay all at once engaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians wanne a great victorie, wherein most of the 40 Africans their enemies were slaine; the rest fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeilded; and Matho himselfe was taken alive. Immediately vpon this victorie, all the Africans that had rebelled, made submission to their old masters: Vtica onely, and Hippagreta stood out, as knowing how little they deserved of fauour. But they were soone forced, to take what conditions best pleased the victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they suffered all torments that could be deuised, in recompence of the mischiefs which they had wrought in this warre. The warre had lasted three yeeres, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whose subjects did not loue them, should with lesse expence, by contenting their Mercina- 50 ries, haue prevented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithlesse dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

WHilest Matho and Spendius were making this terrible combustion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Bostar the Gouvernour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own vie. Against these one Hanno was sent with a small Armie (such as could be spared in that busie time) consisting likewise of Mercenaries, leuied on the Iudden. But these companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their safety, and present profit, to ioyne themselves with those that were already revolted, than to indanger themselves by battaile, for the good of that commonweale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels; offering to runne one course of fortune with them in their enterprize. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore, to take away all 20 ieaousie and distrust, they resolved to hang vpon their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath bene in all Ages, with those that haue vndertaken the quarrell of an vnjust warre, to enioyne the performance of some notorious and villanous act, to those that come into them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they haue in hand. It is indeed the best pawne, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some such Actions, as are equally vnparadonable to all.

By such a kind of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent vnto them for their defence against the Lacedaemonians, by Aratus; who, when hee had formerly posselt himselfe of their Citie, by right of warre, did 30 not onely spare the sacke and spoile thereof, but gaue them equall freedome with the rest of the Cities vntoed. These Results are also common in our Court-warres; where, in the conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of olde friends, we cannot be receiued and trusted by olde enemies. Ce sont les coups de vieille escrim. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: onely they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Ilanders were no lesse glad, than the souldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrey: but they 40 could not agree about the profit of the victorie. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the souldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themselves, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) haue risen, betwene Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: vnlesse the riches of Carthage had serued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrey; the matter was not easily taken vp. So they fell to blowes; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to saue themselves in Italy. 50 Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it, with as good right, as the Amernines had called them into Sicily. Yet this offer was refused, vpon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had reliqued Matho and Spendius with corne; of whom the

the Carthaginians tooke almost fife hundred, and held them in prison. Hercof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadors to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yelded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all prouisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason, did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Pica, offering it selte vnto their subiection. This might haue serued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the issue proued, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept 10 them so temperate, no longer than the hope lalled of thriving better thereby, than they should haue done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended, at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had he bene ouerthrowen by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mightie Citie must either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of merciles villaines, or haue humbled herselfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom shee had lately struen for superiortie. That extreme necessitie, wherinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one fallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage was not farr from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not vnwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a rich, but 20 linking shippe, to runne her selfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recouerie of Sardinia: then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recouered her secte againe; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warre against this enfeebled and impowerished Citie, vnder a shamelesse pretence, that the preparations made for SARDINIA, were made 30 indeed against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselves vnable to resist; and therefore yelded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelue hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could allege) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuasion from Carthage. It is indeed plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of warre. But necessitie taught the Carthaginians patience; and the monie was paid, how hardly focuer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punicke faith, in breach of Couenants: the her selfe hath broken the peace alreadie, which Amilcar purposeth to make her 40 dearely repent; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

§. V.

How the affaires of Carthage went betwene the African Rebellion, and the second Punicke warre.

THe iniurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell; serued to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson. That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolute to be obedient vnto those that were more mighty. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination caslie tooke place; and the best means were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance and Empire. The 50 strength, and the ieaousie of the Romans, forbade all attempts vpon the Mediterranean seas; but the riches of Spain, that lay vpon the Oceanus, were vnknowne to Rome: wherefore that Prouince might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in warre, and to repaire their decayed forces, with all needfull supplies. Of this Spanish Expedition, the charge and sueraigne trust was committed vnto Amilcar: vpon whom whom his Countrey did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recouer strength by his meanes, that had faued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other eniuous men, that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to bee the most worthy of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse, aduising men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amitie they laid, that the felicitie of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Countrey weale; they got none other reputation, than of singularitie: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually vpheld and enlarged, by many notable seruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Countrey. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the western coast of Spain; in which Countrey, during nine yeeres that he liued there, hee subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) hee was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many small victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his sonne in law was made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was a good man of warre; but farre better in practice and cunning, than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow ialous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauē, in the Kingdome of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it neerely retaineth, being called now Carthage*. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but begin to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicily, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbering themselves in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) giuen them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by farre exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuēue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be inuaded by the Gauls, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But hee needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to be feared: it is enough if hee requell; since his requell shall haue the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans vterly destitute of all good colour; that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they scarce had heard the name: so that there were no Numerians, nor other such Rebels, to call in Roman succours. But in the enterprise of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might also serue their turne in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spanish affaires had no relation to the peace betweene these two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Asdrubal had any purpose, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if some such matter had bene suspected) they sent vnto him, requiring that hee should forbear to proceed any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addressing their messengers, rather to Asdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they seeme to haue hoped, that howe soeuer the generalitie of the Carthaginians had sweetly swallowed many bitter pilles, to auoide all occasion of warre with Rome: yet the brauerie of one man might proue more fastidious, and, resenting the iniurie, returne such answer, as would intangle his whole Countrey in the quarrell, quarrell, that they so much desired; and might embrace at leisure, when once they had found apparent cause. But Asdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of dislike at all: and whereas they would haue this insolent couenant inserted into the articles of peace; he tooke vpon him to doe it, of his owne power, with such appearance of conformitie to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and fought no further.

If it had bene so, that the State of Carthage, thereunto pressed by the Romans, for feare of present warre, had ratified this new composition made by Asdrubal, yet should it not haue stood bound in honour, to obserue the same carefully, vntill an oath had also bene extorted, to make all sure. But since all passed quietly, vnder the bare authoritie of Asdrubal; this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a second breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accused more iustly, than they could accuse the Carthaginians of periuice, (as they after did) for refusing to stand to it.

By this Treatie with Asdrubal, the Romans wanne some reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needs be mistress ouer them, stood in feare her selfe, of receiuing blowes from a flouter Dame; there were soone found some, that by offering themselves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-seruants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will shortly teach them another lesson. The Saguntines, a people on the South side of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither subiect, nor open enemy in warre to the Carthaginians) into their societie: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to vse violence towards any that should thus once become confederate with Rome. Neuerthelesse, if we consider the late agreement made with Asdrubal; we shall finde that the Romans could haue none other honest colour of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themselves would not passe, in any Discouerie or Conquest by them intended to be made vpon Spain: in which regard, they might haue some honest pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foote, on the one side of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other side of that Riuer, held almost all the Countrey. Howe soeuer it were, this indignitie was not so easily digested, as former iniuries had bene. For it was a matter of ill consequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginians, should behold Saguntum resting securely among them, vpon confidence of helpe from a more mightie Citie. Wherefore either in this respect; or for that the sense is most feeling of the latest iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themselves right: warre against Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they list. In such termes were the Carthaginians, when Asdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spain eight yeeres: (being slaine by a slave, whose master hee had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, sonne of the Great Amilcar, was chosen Generall in his stead.

§. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of PYRRHVS, to the raigne of PHILIP the sonne of DEMETRIVS in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punick warre, and the vacation following, betweene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somewhat like vnto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre weaker, as in an after-spring. The whole countie had recouered by degrees, a forme of libertie: the pettie tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such Townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not onely serued to defend the selues, but to giue protection to others. This conuerſion to the better, proceeded from the like diſſenſions and tumults in Macedon, as had bene in Greece, when Philip first began to encroch vpon it. For after many quarrels and great warres, about the Kingdome of Macedon, betweene Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gauls: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning fixe and thirtie yeeres; yet so, that he was diuers times thence expelled, not onely by the Gauls, and by Pyrrhus, as hath bene already shewed, but by Alexander the sonne of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly wonne it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of his souldiours, euen at such time, as hauing ouerthrowne with great slaughter an Armie of the Gauls, he was conuering his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receiue his Garrisons. But his yong sonne Demetrius raised an Armie; wherewith he chased Alexander, not onely out of Macedon, but out of his owne Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the helpe of this yong Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; which was iustly termed the ſetter of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood vpon a ſteepe rockie hill on the North ſide of the towne; and was by nature and art ſo ſtrong, that it ſeemed impregnable. It commanded the towne; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betwene the Aegean and Ionique Seas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the Maîne of Greece. Wherefore he that held poſſeſſion of this Caſtle, was able to cut off all paſſage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; beſides the commoditie of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the ſonne of Polyperchon; and after his death, Craſſipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great ſhuffling of Provinces and Townes, that was made betweene Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it paſſed from hand to hand, untill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I finde nothing elſe, than that he was thought to be poſſeſſed by this Antigonus, who deceiued his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The deuice was this. Antigonus ſent his yong Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicea, and ſeek her marriage. The fooliſh old widow perceiued not how vnſit a match ſhe was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage; whereto the old King was euen as readie to conſent, as was his ſonne to deſire it; and came thither in perſon to ſolemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with ſacrifices, feaſts, plaies, and all ſorts of games: in the middelt of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Caſtle, beguiling the poore Ladie, whoſe ieaſouſie had bene exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchaſe hee was ſo glad, that he could not containe himſelfe within the grauitie beſeeming his old age. But as hee had ſtollen it; ſo was it againe ſtollen from him: neither liued he to reuenge the loſſe of it, being already ſpent with age.

Demetrius,

Demetrius, the ſonne of this Antigonus, ſucceeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeeres. He made greater prooſe of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardaniens, Ætolians, and Acheans, held him continually buied in warre; wherin his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About theſe times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Gracians to caſt off their yoke.

Philip, the onely ſonne of Demetrius, was a yong childe when his father died; and therefore Antigonus, his vncl, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince; but he aſſumed the name and power of a King, though hee reſpected Philip as his owne ſonne, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus was called the Tutor, in regard of his Proteſtorſhip; and was alſo Deſon, that is as much as, Will-giue, becauſe he was ſlow in his liberality. He repreſented the Dardaniens and Theſſalians, which moleſted his Kingdome, in the beginning of his raigne. Vpon confidence of this good ſeruiſe, hee tooke ſtate vpon him, as one that rather were King in his owne right, then onely a Proteſtor. Hereupon the people ſett to mutinie; but were ſoonc appeaſed by faire words, and a ſeeming vnwillingneſſe of his to meddle any more with the Gouernment. The Achaïans tooke from him the Citie of Athens, ſoonc after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to haue wrought him out of all or moſt that hee held in Greece, if their owne eſtate had not bene endangered by a neerer enemy. But ciuile diſſention, which had ouerthrowne the power of Greece, when it flouriſhed moſt; ouerthrew it eaſily now againe, when it had ſcarcely recouered ſtrength after a long ſickeſſe; and gaue to this Antigonus no leſſe authoriti: therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like aduantage.

Theſe Achaïans, from ſmall beginnings, had increaſed in ſhort time to great ſtrength and fame: ſo that they grew the moſt redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equalitie of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithſtanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not onely draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the reſt of the Citieſ of Peloponnesus, to be gouerned by one Lawe, and to vſe one and the ſame ſort of waight, meaſure, and monie.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the firſt that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had bene by the Macedonian Captaines diuided into many Principalityes. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as moſt of the great Citieſ of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they firſt ſubiected themſelues, after the deſcent of the Heraclids, when Tiſſamenus the ſonne of Oreſtes poſſeſſed the Terriorie of Achaia. In this eſtate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whom, when his ſonnes fought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predeceſſors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as ſeeming moſt equall. This forme of Common-wealth had continuance, with ſome ſmall changes according to the diuerſitie of times, till the raigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempeſt-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For thoſe twelue Citieſ, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a little before the Battaille of Leuctres; were, by diſturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from ea: h other, and trained into a warre, no leſſe fooliſh than cruell, among themſelues. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere it, Ptolomee the ſonne of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomee Ceraunus, left the world ſtwo of the ten remaining Citieſ and people, namely, the Patrenſes and the Dimeis, vnited themſelues, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, which after followed. For hauing bene, ſome of them Partiſans with ſundry Macedonian Captaines, and others hauing bene gouerned by pettie Kings; they began to faſten themſelues in a ſtrong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before ſpoken of, and partly, at ſuch time as Pyrrhus made his firſt voiage into Italie. Now after the vniting of the Patrenſes and Dimeis, to whom alſo the Citieſ of Tritea, and Phara, ioyned themſelues;

Agira

Ægira chased out her Garrison; and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Cerantians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twentie & five yeeres, vied the same forme of Governement with the Achaïans; who by a Senatorie and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Commonweale; and soone after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Caryneus was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who living at Argos in exile, whilst his Countrey was oppressed by Tyrants, found means, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get 10 among the Greekes, than wife in looking to his owne. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians entred into the Achaïan league: which though at that time it received more increase, by their acceſſion, than it added strength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction served well enough against Antigonus, whose subtilty was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industrie and counsaile of Aratus deliuered his Countrey from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaïan league: so further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great cost of one hundred and fiftie talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuersies, betwene the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands, as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises 20 following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaïa. The money he obtained of Ptolemie Euergetes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conversation of Aratus himselfe, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wanne by night, being thereto guided by some theuees that he had hired for the purpose, who living in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasure, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. 30 Yet was he faine to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeede Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouer-come by their owne feare, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaïans were more in number, than in truth they were, and hauing lost the advantages of the place already, vpon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kinde of night-seruices, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, hee was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he minished argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might looke pale and tremble, when he beganne battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diuersified, by the sundry natures of men, and in a manner confined, vnto seuerall sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said; that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a natural inclination standeth in neede of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vse, good successe, and other helpe, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Countrey he was vnproueable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaïa, the Megarians revolted soon after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Troazentians, and the Epidauriens: whereby this new erected State grew so powerfull, that it aduentured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos and Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprise vpon Athens was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamis, to shew his strength, and

and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ranſome, to allure the Citie by shew of loue; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest slaues to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more strongly. The Achaïans came sometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might haue wonne it, if the Citizens would haue lent any helpe to the recouerie of their owne freedom; sundrie times, and with diuers euent, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose vpon one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battaile; but all sufficed not: vntill at length Arifomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perswaded, and hired, by 10 Aratus, that he consented to resigne his estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phliasians. Whilst this buſinesse with the Argines was on foot, Lyſidas the Tyrant of Megalopolis was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gaue libertie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaïa: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen General of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two yeeres together by one man) euerie second yeere, for a certaine while, he and Aratus succeeding one another by turnes. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lyſidas and Arifomachus, were carried with private passion from care of the generall good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaïa, as shall appeare 20 in due time.

The Achaïans hauing obtayned so much puissance and reputation; that Ptolemie King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) General of their forces by Sea and Land; made open Warre vpon Demetrius the Sonne of Antigonus Gonatas, for the libertie of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had lost a battaile the Athenians wore Garlands, in signe of ioy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had wonne the victorie. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter seruit, aut superbe dominatur; It is either base in seruice, or insolent in command. Neuerthelesse when 30 Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by monie, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased libertie to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achaïans, louing them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could doe: but in to their Corporation they entred not, forning it belike, in regard of their owne out-worne glorie.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaïa daily increased within Peloponnesus, by iustice and honestie; so did the Ætolians, in the viter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it selfe, waxe very powerfull, by ſturdineſſe of bodie, and rude courage in fight, without helpe of any other vertue. They had stoutly defended themselves 40 against Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to doe and suffer much, partly by the natural strength and fastnesse of their Countrey; but especially by the benefit of the time, which called away these famous Captaines to other buſinesse, as hath bene related. They had molested Cassander, in fauour of Antigonus; and were themselves as much plagued by him, & by the Acarnanians, a little, but a stout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to doe with Demetrius, the sonne of the first Antigonus, and more or lesse, with all the Kings of Macedon succeeding him. They likewise held often Warre with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epiriots, and many Cities in Peloponnesus: so that they were hardened with perpetual traualle; seldom putting off their Armour. But their hardnesse ill deferred the name of valour, seeing they had no regard of honestie or friendship; measuring all things by their owne insolent wil, and thinking all people base-minded, that were not as fierce and outrageous as themselves.

These Ætolians had lately made great spoiles in Peloponnesus, and occupied a good part of the countrey. They had invaded the friends of the Achaïans taken and sacked fallene; where although they were soundly beaten by Aratus, yet their desire of gaine made them greedie of a new voyage thither, as to a Countrey wherein some-what was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another way, by Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus Gonatas: who pressed them so hardly, that they were driuen to seeke helpe of the Achaens, which they obtained. The warre which the Achaens made vpon Demetrius, without Peloponnesus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly vnto the Ætolians, at whose instance it was set on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diuerted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very basely the Ætolians, giuing thanks in words, deuiled how to requite the benefit with some great mischief. They saw that the Achaens were desirous, to bring all Peloponnesus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedemonians were very ielous. Wherefore these Ætolians laboured earnestly, to let the Lacedemonians and Achaens together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to passe, they themselves should be called into helpe (it killed not on what side) and so get no small share, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their deuice vnto Antigonus, offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many losses, that his Kingdome had sustained by the Achaens. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to suffer many indignities, rather than to giue the Lacedemonians cause to take armes. But this resolution was taken somewhat too late: and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been meddling with the Archadians, that were dependants of Lacedemon; and thereby had prouoked the Lacedæmonians to looke about them, seeing that all Peloponnesus, excepting themselves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians, their friends (who also were attempted) was already become Achaean.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill case about these times, and subiect to the injuries of any stronger Neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakened it; The Ætolians entering Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fittie thousand slaves; and, which was worse, their discipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxurie reigned among them, the poore was oppressed by the rich, & the generositie of spirit, that had sometime beene their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the best of them. There were left in Sparta no more than seuen hundred naturall Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had lands: all the rest were needie people and desirous of innouation. Hereupon followed intestine sedition; which endangered the Citie most of all. Agis a good King, who sought to reforme the disorders of the State, exhorted the people to a strict obseruation of Lycurgus his laws. To which purpose he caused them to passe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equal diuision of lands. All the younger, and the poorer sort were glad of this: but the rich men opposed it. These had recourse vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himselfe a dissolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence also he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King chosen in his stead. But Agis his friends and Counsaillors in this enterprise, abused his good meaning to their owne priuate commoditie. They were haitie to take away all debts, and cancell bonds, for they themselves were deeply indebted; but the diuision of lands they afterwards hindered, because their owne possessions were great. Hence arose a tumult in Sparta, which the men increased by their foule oppression of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and restored to his Kingdome, and the two aduerser Kings driuen to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was dismissed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawne into prison, and there by his enemies condemned and strangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-mother. The like to this was neuer knowne in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magistrates that should haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vsing their power, and more power than to them belonged, against against a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the lawes required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and serued to establish the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppressors. In which case Aratus might well hope, to adioyne Lacedemon to the Achaean Common-wealth: though it were great iniustice to take such aduantages, & attempt by force, that which would haue redounded to the generall good of Peloponnesus, and to the benefit of Sparta it selfe, if it could haue bene wrought by perswasion.

But the same man who redressed the disorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did also require the iniunct attempts of the Achaens, euen in their owne kind: obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponnesus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedemonians and their King, should haue bene the principall; nor they and their Prætor. Leonidas hauing thus caused Agis to be slaine, tooke his wife that was very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in mariage (perforce) to his owne sonne Cleomenes. This yong Prince full greatly enamoured on his wife, and sought to winne her affection, as well as he had her person. He discouered much with her about the purpose of her former husband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertaine a desire of accomplishing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming him selfe to be King, whilst he was very yong, hee gladly embraced all occasions of warre: for that he hoped by strong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in so corrupt an estate of the Citie, had attempted to his owne ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Albænum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megaleopolitans pretended title, he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but fought to take by surprize Tegæa and Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedemonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he lost the labour of a painfull nights traile, and discouered his enmitie to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing sorrie. By these degrees the warre began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had discouered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would haue staied the quarrell from proceeding so farre. But Lysitides and Arifomachus would needes fight, and he could doe none other than be ruled by them; especially seeing Cleomenes was so vrgent. Arifomachus was at that time General of the Achaens, (He & Lysitides being of great account, since they had abandoned their tyrannie) who sent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his assistance in a iourne to be made into Laconia. No dissuasions of Aratus would serue: therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, little pleasing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Arifomachus, who desired to giue battaile. Yet had the Achaens twentie thousand foot, & one thousand horse in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thousand in all. This gaue reputation to the Lacedæmonian, and raised an ill report vpon Aratus, which Lysitides helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuthelesse the Achaens would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their General the yere, following, against Lysitides his accuser that sued for the place. Being General himselfe, it behoued him to confute, with deedes, the slanderous wordes of Lysitides. Therefore he purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, nere vnto the Mount Lycaeus, by Cleomenes, who vanquished him in a great battaile, and drave him to hide himselfe all night for feare, so that he was thought to haue bene slaine. This misaduenture Aratus recompensed by a trick of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue been expected, had he bin victorious. For whilst there was no suspition of any great matter that he could vndertake, he secretly wrought with some of the Maninæans, who did let him into their Citie. The Maninæans had once before ioyned themselves with the Achaens; but shortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gaue themselves to

to the Ætolians; and from the Ælians, presently after this victorie, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their leuitie they were not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achaean societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus; so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountered neere vnto Megalopolis; where the Achaens had somewhat the better at the first, but their General durst not follow his aduantage. Therupon Lysidas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedemonians, whom hee routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too farre into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driuen backe vpon their owne Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Armie was disordered, and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the Achaens against Aratus; yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuertheless, wherein though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achaens being wearie, and the Spartan King intenuie to another buisnesse.

Cleomenes hauing led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull journeys, forsooke the Achaean warre on a sudden, and came vnspected home to Sparta, where hee slue the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycorgus. Then gaue hee an accompt of his doings; and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had inroched vpon the power of Kings; and many disorders had growne in the Citie; he justified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal diuision of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. Hee also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether stand in neede of mercinarie helpe, as it lately had done, to saue it selfe from the Ætolians, Thyrians, and other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied; and Cleomenes himselfe ready in the field, ere his enemies could take aduantage of these his domestick troubles.

The Achaens hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long, ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the Citie, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had waited all the Countrie of Megalopolis; had ranged ouer all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Manitina; and readie to take other places, euen of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little; but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, hee proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedemonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himselfe had the heart to demand the Principalltie of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend, about the possession of a few Townes: but aduentured to winne or lose all. The Ætolians, in fauour of this attempt, declared themselves on his side: and whereas he had gotten Manitina, Teges, and other places, to which they had some title, they willingly renounced all their interest vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and saw that Antigonus with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would shortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begonne. Therefore hee desired how to provide against the worst, and either to repaire all, or (if it could not bee) to saue all from utter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, hee refused; fearing to bee so farre prest, as to hazzard in one battaile all the force of his Countrie, to which as hee had neuer any affection, nor perance courage, so was his manner of warfare otherwise. For he commonly attempted by surpris, and defended vpon the aduantage of place, after the manner of the Irish, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forsake the care of the weale publike, though in aiming at the generall good, it seemes that priuate passion drew him into an ill course. He saw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Manitina had not only opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but slaine the Achaean Garrison that lay therein; that other Townes had yielded vnto him, without compulsion; and that Aristomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and since Generall of the Achaens, was now revolted vnto the enemy, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemie was too farre off to helpe; and the neceressie of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be vsfull, if this King would (as Polybius saith) like others, be friend or enemy, as should best agree with his owne profit. To make triall hercof, Aratus practised with some of Megalopolis, whom he found apt vnto his purpose; and instructed them how to deale both with Antigonus, and the Achaens.

The Citie of Megalopolis had bene well affected to the Macedonians, euer since the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by some especiall benefits. At this time it lay neere vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deserved succour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achaens, with their owne proper strength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embassadors should bee sent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requesting leaue and good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their necessitie. This was granted, for lack of what else to answer; and the same Embassadors dispatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and respect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predecessours; of their present neede; and how it would agree with his honour to giue them aide. But when they deliuered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had giuen them instruction; shewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his owne great losse or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himselfe did stand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achaens vnder the Patronage of Macedon; then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentue care to their discourse. He embraced the motion; and to giue it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe should not be wanting, so farre forth, as it might stand with the Achaens good liking. Particularly he commended himselfe, by these Messengers, to Aratus; assuring them, that he thought himselfe highly bound to this honourable man, whose former actions he now perceived, not to haue bene grounded vpon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only vpon a iust and worthy loue to his owne Nation. With this answer they returne to Megalopolis; and are presently sent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make some speedy conclusion, as the necessitie of the time required.

The Achaens were glad to heare, that Antigonus was so inclinable to their desire; and therefore were ready to entertaine his fauour, with all good correspondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his consent; and praised the wisdom of his Countymen, that so well discerned the best and likeliest meanes of their common fauour: adding neuertheless, that it were not amisse, first of all to trie their owne abilitie; which if it failed, then should they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus hee shewed himselfe moderate, in that which himselfe of all others did most with: to the end, that hee might not afterward sustaine the common reprehension, if any thing fell out amisse; since it might appeare, that he had not bene Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leisurably, the generall consent. Neuertheless in true estimation, this finess of Aratus might haue bene vsed, with his greater commendation, in a contrarie course. For it had bene more honourable, to make an end of the Warre, by yielding vnto Cleomenes that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus; since thereby he should both haue freed his

Countrie

Countrie from all further trouble; and withall should haue restored vnto the vniuersall state of Greece, that honorable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pittie) that Vertue hauing risen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it selfe, (as it were) in the seat of Principallitie, by length of time, and successe of many actions; can ill endure the hasty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it sees it selfe likely to bee ouer-topped. Other cause to despise the Lacedemonians there was none; than that they lately had bin in dangerous case: neither could any reason be found, why Aratus should prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had hood in doubt of the one, when he thought himselfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was iustly plagued, when he saw his owne honors reuerfed by the insolent Macedonians; and in stead of liuing as a companion with Cleomenes, that was defended of a long race of Kings, the posteritie of Hercules was faine to doe sacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a God, and was finally poisoned by Philip, whose Nobilitie was but of siue descents, and whom perhaps he might haue seene his fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolomie was lost: who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not supply him with such liberalitie, as hee had vied to the Achaens; being warned, as may seeme, by their example, to be more warie both in trusting & disburfing. Cleomenes himselfe, whilest this businesse with Antigonus was aloft, passed through Arcadia with an Armie, & laboured by all means to draw the Achaens to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were assembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their estate, without seeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where hee had so great a victorie, that the enemy was no longer able to keepe the open field. The calamitie was such, that Aratus himselfe durst not take vpon him to be their Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Achaens were compelled to sue for peace; which was granted vpon this easie condition: That they should not arrogate vnto themselves the command of Peloponnesus, but suffer the Lacedemonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in Warre. Hereunto if they would condescend, he promised vnto them, that he would presently restore all places taken from them, and all his prisoners ransom-free: also that they should enjoy their owne Lawes and Liberties without molestation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleasing to the Achaens: who desired him to come vnto the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament should be held, for the conclusion of the Warre.

Now seemed the affaires of Greece likely to be settled in better order, than they had euer bene since the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warres, yea or since the Persian Inuasion: when God, who had otherwise disposed of these matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes dranke in a great heat, and thereupon fell extreme sick, and so could not be present at Lerna, but caused the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Neuertheless he sent home the chiefe of his prisoners, to shew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Achaens in their desire of his friendship: who assembled againe at Argos, there to establish the League. But Aratus was violently bent against it; and fought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Countymen afraid of resolving. When all would not serue turne, he betooke himselfe to his cunning, and sent word to Cleomenes, that hee should doe well to leaue his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiuing Hostages for safetie of his person. Cleomenes was already farre on his way, when he met with this aduertisement: and tooke it ill part, that he should be thus deluded. For it had bene an easie matter, to haue told him so much at the first, and not haue made him come so farre with an Armie, which afterwards he must dismisse. Yet that which chiefly seemes to haue troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who fought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with themselves and their Messengers; or if he would adventure himselfe into the Citie, then to deprive him of all Royall shew, that might breed respect of him in the Multitude. This was that indeede which Aratus feared, and for which he sought to hinder his coming thither in person: lest the people, hearing the promises of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, & finish the bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these juggling tricks: and Aratus was not farre behinde with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betwene feare of the one, and ruereence of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceede, but abruptly brake vp, leauing all as it were to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his aduantage of their present weaknesse, and renewed the Warre. Many Citiees yielded vnto him willingly; many hee forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieue the distressed Achaens. Antigonus gaue as good words as could be wished, sauing that he vtterly refused to doe any thing, vntill he might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hand. This demand was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horle against his enemy the Stag; but with condition, that the Horle should suffer himselfe to be faddled & bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserued, to be thus giuen away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arrest him. So hee withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and sent word to Antigonus, that the Castle should bee ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he fought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus, by surrounding it with Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leaue. Whilest this was in doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be safely kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agrecment, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Syrians, to Peloponnesus: promising that if he would harken to these persuasions, then would he giue him double the same pension, which hee had bene wont to receiue of King Ptolomie. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soueraignie of the Countrie; he desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be ioyntly kept by the Lacedemonians and Achaens. All this entreatie serued to no purpose. For Aratus, receiuing vnto the motion, sent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achaens, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes vnderstood, he seized vpon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrie of Sicyon, wherof this his Aduersarie was native.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neere to the Issmus; hauing passed with his Armie through Eubaea, because the Aetolians held the streights of Thermopylae against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, wherunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this iourne. At his coming thither he found the Lacedemonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battaile, but rather to wearie him thence with hunger, against which hee came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to doe: hee secretly got into the Corinthian Haue; but was violently driuen out againe, with great losse of men; finally hee resolved to turne aside, and seeke a passage ouer the gulf of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexitie newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, gonus, and no lesse troubled his Enemies; The Achaens were gotten into that Citie; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driuen out of the Citadell, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in neede of present helpe. Argos had alwaies bin enemie to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooke it, he forbare to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreatie of friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperitie. They were glad indeede of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditours, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would have bene tyrannicall, he did it not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their vniust hopes, beganne to turne good Common-wealths-men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because hee would not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Achaens; assailed his Garrison; cut in peeces the Rescue that he sent; and compelled him at length, to forsake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behind his backe. For when he vnderstood, by continuall messages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almost lost: hee beganne to feare, lest his labouring guarding the entry should grow fruitlesse; the Achaens in the meane while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore hee forsooke his custodie of the isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could faue, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so farre he prevailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argues and Achaens were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets: when the horse-men of Antigonus were discovered a farre off, halting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himselfe (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soone as the Spartan had turned his backe) following apace with the bodie of his Armie. Cleomenes therefore had no more to doe, than to make a safer retreat. This he did; and got him home into Laconia: looting in short space all, or most of that which he had bene long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himselfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Areadia; where he wanne such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he tooke his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Achaens: to whom he declared the cause of his comming, and spake braue wordes, that filled them with hope. The Achaens were not behinde him; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into covenant with him, That they should not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while, & somewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Towne (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if in stead of Cleomenes that would haue bene a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen vpon the Achaens. This was hardly taken: yet worse must be endured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himselfe ouer-carefully respected; when the statues of those Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were againe erected by Antigonus; or when the statues, which he had erected, of those that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all throwne downe by the same King, and one only left vnto himselfe at his earnest entreatie. It might therefore appeare, that this God was also spitefull. Neuerthelasse in taking reuenge vpon those that offended him, Aratus did satisfie his owne passion by the aide of these Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Arismachus to death, who had bene once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achaens; and from them reuoluing vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like sort handled handled hee (though not as yet) the Mantineans for their ingratitude and crueltie shewed to the Achaens. For hee slue all the principal Citizens, and sold the rest, men, women, and children, all for bond-slaves: diuiding the spoile; to two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achaens. The Towne it selfe was giuen by Antigonus to the Argues: who peopled it with a Colonie of their owne; and Aratus hauing charge of this businesse, caused it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this crueltie there can be no better excuse; than euen the flatterie, which Aratus was driuen to vse to Antigonus: forasmuch as it was token of seruilitie, whereinto they had vrged and brought him; whom hee, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite.

But leauing to speake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill state of the Achaens; Let vs returne into his warre against the Luedemonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wanne Tegæa, Mantineæ, Orchomeno, Heræa, and Telphusa: Mantineæ hee dispeopled, as was said before; in Orchomenus hee placed a Garrison of his Macedonians; the rest hee restored to the Achaens: with whom hee wintered at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this yeare; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his owne Territory. The reason why hee stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantineæ, and to those other Townes that hee wanne, was this: Hee had few Souldiers, and not monie enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Ægyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, vntill he might haue Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Ægypt; yet the aide came not. For Ptolemy was slow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of necessity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himselfe, as well as his owne abilitie would serue. Hee manumised all the Heiotes, which were the Luedemonian slaves: taking monie for their libertie, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Having thus increased his forces, hee came on the sudden to Megalopolis; thar lay secure, as hauing defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus neere at hand in Ægium. The Towne hee wanne: but after he was entred, all that were fit to beare armes, rose hastily against him; & though they could not driue him out, yet saued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. Hee lent after the Citizens, offering their Towne and goods to them againe, if they would be of his partie. But they brauely refused his offer: wherefore hee sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that hee found therein. These newes astonished the Achaens at Ægium: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in comming, that Cleomenes was safely gone home. Therefore hee returned them back to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos, there to passe the rest of this vnlucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the greued Achaens. When he had laine awhile at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argues perceiving that their Countie would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field; were very earnest with him to goe forth and fight. But hee was wiser then to be moued with their clamours; and suffered them to see their villages burnt; to bid him resigne his Office of Protector vnto some that were more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with foolish wordes; rather than he would be ouer-come in fight, and thereby lose more honour than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakning the reputation of his enemie: though he thereby added neither followers, nor other strength, vnto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for warre, Antigonus gathered together all his troupes; meaning to requite these brauado's of his enemie, with the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the warre from his owne gates; and therefore entred vpon the Countie of Argos, where hee made

such hauocke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Countrey of the Argives, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garillon of his out of Oligyria; and did sacrifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Iuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorn, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yet serued to dishearten the Achaean side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore hee concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by setting vp his rest, without more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Armie eight and twentie thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundrie Nations, as Macedonians, Ilyrians, Gauls, Epirots, Boeotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Acheans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus comming to Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, vpon and between the hills of Eua and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before hee could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, which he greatly desired, without the bazzard of his whole armie, in assailing their well-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolu'd to make an end one way or other, Antigonus attempted with his Ilyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eua. but his Ilyrians were so ill seconded by the Achaean foot, that the Spartan horse, & light-armed foot, incamped in the streight vallie between those hills, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts; and not onely disordered them, but were like to haue endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaille, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Eucidas, his brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopamen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proued a famous Captaine, serued then on horse, as a private yong man, among the Acheans. He seeing that all was like to goe to rout, if their Ilyrians were driuen to fall backe vpon the Army following them; perswaded the Capitaines of the Achaean horse, to break vpon the Spartan Mercinaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge, partly, for that Antigonus had giuen order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they receiued a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopamen perceiuing them to be more orderly, than well aduised; entreated some of his owne Countreymen to follow him; gaue a charge vpon the Spartans; and forced them not onely to leaue the Ilyrians, but seeke how to saue themselves. Being so farre aduanced, he found the place which the Ilyrians had attempted, like enough to bee wonne, & through the vnskilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore hee alighted, and perswaded the men at armes his Companions to doe the like: the folly of Eucidas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to binder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon euen termes. So he recovered the Hill top; where though he was foreburt, yet yee made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedaemonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Eucidas, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himselfe, was like to haue bene furrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawne himselfe with an extraordinary speed. In this battaille ended the glorie of Lacedaemon, which, as a light readie to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, then in many ages past.

Cleomenes

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no desire to stay, finding onely two hundred left, of fixe thousand Spartans that he had led vnto this battaille, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So hee perswaded his people to yeelde themselves vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lie in his owne power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before prouided, against all that might happen) and imbarqued himselfe for Egypt. Hee was louingly entertained by Ptolemie Evergetes; who vnderooke to restore him to his Kingdome; and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour and qualities. In the meane season hee had a pension allowed him, of foure and twentie talents, yearly. But this Ptolemie died; and his sonne Ptolemie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious yong Prince, wholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindfull of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, whether the troubles in Peloponnesus did seeme to inuite him; Ptolemie, and his Minions, would neither giue him aide; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his owne friends in Greece, because he was too well acquainted with the weakenesse of Egypt: nor well knew how to detain him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him was; that with thirtie of his Countreymen, he vnderooke a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrins to rebell and seeke their libertie. In which attempt hee slue foure enemies of his that he met; and hauing walked vp and downe the Ibrets, without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) he, and his Companions, agreed together to bee ministers of their owne death. Vpon his dead bodie Ptolemie was bold to shew his indignation; and slue his Mother and Children, that had bene sent thither as Hostages, together with the wiues of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such was the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Sonne of Leonidas, who had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudie ende, as now befell his owne Wife, Sonne, and Grand-children.

After the Victorie at Selasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta: wherinto neuer the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. Hee kindly entreated the Citizens, and left them to their owne Lawes and Gouernment: tarrying there no longer, than two or three dayes; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure was, an advertisement that he receiued out of Macedon; how the Ilyrians ouer-ran, and destroyed the Countrey. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few dayes longer, or at least-wile tarried a few dayes after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedaemon would haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battaille with the Ilyrians, and ouer-came them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by ouer-frayning his voice; wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, who was troubled before with a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the sonne of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, furnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolemie Philopater; beganne to raigne in Asia, and Egypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolemie, though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuentene yeeres of his raigne. The vnripe age of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is vsual in the minoritie of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted with the Romans; vpon which which occasion, when it comes, we shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

¶ VII.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece; and how they were subdued by the Romans.

Hillest things thus passed in Greece; and whilst the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spain: the Romans had found themselves worke among the Sardinians and Corseans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished againe, when they rebelled. They made also warre with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little paine. With the Gauls they had much ado, that lasted not long; being rather, as Liue saith, a tumult then a warre. So that by all these light exercises, their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Islands in the Mediterranean Sea; it hath bene shewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gauls, it is not meet to be utterly silent.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slauonia: a troublesome Nation, so impatient of rest, and continually making warre for gaine, without either regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to helpe the Mydonians, his friends, that were besieged by the Ætolians, for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrian succours came, the Mydonians were so far spent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honour of the victory, and the diuision of the spoile to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and wonne the Towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had wonne the victories, which anon they lost, at Positiers and at Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus: That the old, and the new Prætor, should be ioyntly intitled in the victorie, and haue equall authoritie in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Ætolians; & though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their owne multitude, partly by helpe of the Mydonians, that were not idle in their owne businesse, but hourly fallied out of the Towne. Many of the Ætolians were slaine, more were taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians tooke the spoile, and went their way; the Mydonians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voyage, highly pleased Agon King of the Illyrians: not only in regard of the monie, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance, or of the booty that was gotten; but for that hauing vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, hee found it not vneasie, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For ioy of this he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a pleurisie, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdom, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Tenta, his wife.

Tenta gaue her people free libertie, to rob all Natson at Sea, making no difference betweene friend and foe; as if shee had bene sole Mistress of the salt Waters. Shee armed a fleet, and sent it into Greece: willing hee Captaines, to make warre, Warre where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell with the westerne coast of Peloponnesus; where they invaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, & stayed at the Citie of Phenice, to take in victualles and other necessaries. There lay in Phenice eight hundred Gauls; that hauing bene Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but sayling to do either, they neuertheless resolved, and were for their misdeeds disarmed, and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lie in Garrison within their Towne. The Gauls were soone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phenice, which deserued none other, in trusting them. Al Epirus was presently in armes, and halsted to driue out these vnwelcome guests. But whilst the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that was marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Sceurdilidas; whom Queene Tenta had sent to helpe his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonis, to make good that Towne, and the freights adioyning, by which these new commers mult enter into their Countie; another part of them remaines at Phenice, to continue the siege. Neither the one, nor the other, sped well in their businesse. For Sceurdilidas found meanes to ioyne with his fellowes; and they that were besieged within Phenice, sallied out of the towne, and gaue such an ouerthrow to the Epirots, as made them despaire of sauing their Countie, without great and speedie helpe from abroad. Wherefore Embassadors were sent to the Ætolians and Ætolians: craving their helpe, with very pitifull termes of entreatie. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Armie, sent by these two Nations, was readie in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Sceurdilidas. But Sceurdilidas was called home, by letters from Tenta the Queene, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazard, but offered composition; which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransom some their Towne, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their booty and slaues. Hauing made this profitable and honourable bargain; the Illyrians returned into their own Countie by Land, sending their booty away by Sea.

At their comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandment of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Marchants, whilst they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadors were sent to require of Tenta, that she should abstaine from doing such iniuries. These Embassadors found her very iolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that shee had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought al to good order, saue only the towne of Issa, which her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperitie, shee could hardly afford a good looke to the vnmanly Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyrracie, required amends. Yet when their speech was ended, the vouchsafed to tell them, That iniurie in publike shee would doe them none: as for priuate matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subjects to get commoditie, how they best could, by Sea. But (said the yonger of the two Embassadors) we Romans haue a manner, and a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publike, of those priuate wrongs that are borne out by publike authoritie: therefore we shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your Kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without al regard of the common Law of Nations, shee caused him to be slaine: as if that had bene the way, to set her heart at rest; which was indeede the meane, to disquiet and afflict it euer after.

The Romans, prouoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea,

Sea, confisting of two hundred faile, commanded by C. Philinus; the other by Land, led by A. Pophumus. They trouble not themselves any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this iniurie is of such nature, as must be requited with mortall warre. It is indeede contrarie to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to bee this; that since without mediation, there would neuer be an end of warre and destruction, therefore it was equally receiued by all Nations, as a lesion taught by Nature, that Embassidors should passe freely, and in safetie, betwene enemies. Neuertheless, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King, or State, lay hold vpon Embassadours sent by their enemies, not vnto themselves, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then it is as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadours (thus employed, to makethe warre more terrible) as it is to kill the men of warre, and subiects, of an enemy. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slew the Lacedemonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a warre vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, which practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law whatsoever. For whereas the true Office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassadour doe it without incurring justly the same danger of punishment, with other Traitors; in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Ciuitians; and goe on with the reuenges taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadour Corinacianus.

The Illyrian Queene was secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stirre against her. She was indeede in an error; that hath vndone many of all sorts greater and lesse than she, both before and since: Having more regard vnto fame, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Aetolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had theesse easily vanquished; and therefore thought, that with the Romans the should be little troubled. Had the considered, that her whole Armie, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; and that neuertheless, it prevailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; theesse would haue continued to vse her aduantage, against those that were of more fame than strength, with such good caution, that the should not haue needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mightie than her selfe. But she was a woman, and did what she listed. Shee sent forth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commission to take all that could bee gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe; and one part of it fell with a Dyrrachium, the other, with Coreya. Dyrrachium was almost surprized by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In Coreya the Illyrians landed; wasted the Isle, and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Aetolians and Acheans were called in to helpe: who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of lesse note, Marcus Caryneis, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Towne of Coreya, dismayed with it is overthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius; who tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Tents was angry with her Captaine Demetrius: I know not why; but so, as he resolved to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans were euen ready to put to Sea, though vncertaine which way to take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consull, of Demetrius his fake and discontent. Likely it was, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduantage the businesse in hand. Wherefore the Consull sailed thither; where hee found the Towne of Coreya so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only receiued him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

After

After this good beginning, the Consull sailed alongst the coast, to Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vsed thenceforth as his counsailler and guide. To Apollonia came also Pophumus, the other Consull, with the Land-Armie, numbered at twentie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they halten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they disperse themselves. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twentie of their ships; and enforce the Queene Tenta to forsake the coast, and to couer her selfe in Rifon, farr within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans halte them home ward, and leaue the best 10 places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staies behinde, and persecutes the warre, in such sort, that Tenta was forced to begge peace: which shee obtained vpon miserable conditions; to wit, That shee should quit the better part of Illyria, & pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth, neuer send any of her ships of warre, towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Lissa; except it were some one or two vessels, vnarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian warre, the Romans sent Embassadours into diuers parts of Greece, signifying their loue to the Countrey, and how, for good will thereto, they had made warre with good successe vpon Tenta, and her people. They hoped, be- 20 like, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage; which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their owne games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Illyrian pastimes. This was an idle courtiesie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, saue a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

¶ VIII.

Of the warre betwene the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italic.

He Gauls that dwelt in Lumbardie, were the next, against whom the Romans tooke Armes. These were a populous Nation, and often molled Rome; sometimes with their owne forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the issue of that warre proued not answerable to the beginning, if we may giue credit vnto Roman Historians. In following times, their successe was variable, and commonly bad. Many overthrowes they receiued; and if they got any victorie, it yielded them no profit, but was soone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduised: lightly stirred vp to warre, and lightly giuing out. At the first 40 brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, lesse than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience; and knew how to handle them: yet gane alwaies carefull heede to their approach, were it only bruted. For the danger of them was sudden, and vncertaine; by reason of their neighbourhood, and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, were called warres, but tumults; Gallies & tumults of the Gauls; and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italic, and vied to rise with great Armies: but 50 after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion serued to disperse them. Having receiued an overthrow; they would rest ten, or twelue yeeres, sometimes twentie or thirtie: till they were stirred vp againe, by younger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whilst they rested; the state of Rome, that against thesse made only defensiu warre, had leasure to grow, by sitting vpon upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchie, which hee intended to raise: that the Gauls neuer fell upon Italie, with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous warre. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilst Pyrrius was traualing in the same enterprise; or in either of the two former Punick warres: it may be doubted what would have become of this imperious Cite. But it seemes that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than strangers had in Gaul. At least, they knew not how to vie their times: and were therefore like to smart, whensoever the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, should finde leisure to visit them at their owne home: which was now after the first Punick Warre. Once before this, the Romans had beene bold, to set upon the Gauls in their owne Countrey; and that was three yeeres before the coming of Pyrrius into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Helvetia, and besieging Arretium, had wonne a great battaile and slaine L. Cassilius with the most of his Armie. Manlius Curius the new Consull, sent Embassadors to them, to treat about ranfome of prisoners. But these Embassadors they slue. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled these Senones out of their Countrey, and sent a Colonie of their owne to inhabit it. This caused the Boij, another people of Gaul, to feare the like measure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted vntill this end of the Illyrian warre.

It vexed the Gauls, to see a Roman Colonie planted in their Countrey; who had beene accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by diuining over their Neighbours force. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpinos (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they are neerer; like as they called Cisalpinos, or by-liber the Alpes, those who dwell betwene them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their disunion had caused their losse, so their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the businesse was so foolishly carried, that the Cisalpinos and Transalpinos, fell together by the eares, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of warre. Soone after, they were vrged by a greater indignitie, to goe more substantially to worke. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, propoed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colonie already planted in the territorie of the Senones, as many more should be caried thither, as would serue to people the whole Countrey betwene Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vterly those Gauls. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it selfe, would not ouer-joy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome took this in for good part, notwithstanding all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had cuer after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boij: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because all the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolue, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Duchie of Milan, joynd with the Boij, & upon a common purpose entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhoda-nus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates hauing received a great Imprest, come to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Concolitanus & Amer-sus: who with the Boij and Insurbians, compound an Armie of fiftie thousand foot, and twentie thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that euer invaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Seno-galli, that had beene beaten out of their possessions, gaue a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleuing in their prosperitie and rising fortune. For feare of whose incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leaue a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: With the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger,

send Amilius to Rimini, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Attilius their other Consull, who then was in Sardinia, they employ one of their Prators, for the defence of Tuscane.

Being at this time greatly troubled, with the consideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gauls had assembled, they caused a view to bee taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no lesse willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their owne destruction could not bee prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserue to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consulls they sent forth to the warre foure Legions of their owne: euery Legion consisting of fife thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse. There were also appointed for Supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fiftie thousand foot, & foure thousand horse; which Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Embrici and Sardinians, which inhabited the Apennines, there were twentie thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomanni, other twentie thousand: which latter Armies were directed, to invade the Boij, that forcing them to defend their owne Territories, the general Armie of the Gauls should be thereby greatly diminished. There were besides these, to bee ready against all vnexpected chances of warre, thirtie thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse, garrisoned in Rome it selfe, of their owne people; and of their Allies, thirtie thousand foot, and two thousand horse.ouer and about these great troupes; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent vnto the Senate, there were numbered fourecore thousand foot, and fife thousand horse; in that of the Sammites, seuentie thousand foot, and of horse seuen thousand, in that of the Lapyges, and Messapyges, fiftie thousand foot, and sixteen thousand horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the Atarpi, Marrucini, Ferentani, and the Veſtini, of twentie thousand foot, and four thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicily, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand foure hundred foot, and foure hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campanians jointly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were registred two hundred and fiftie thousand foot; and of horse, three and twentie thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fiftie thousand foot and about six thousand horse. Calling vpon the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italie, both of the Romans and their Confederates, it amounted to seuen hundred thousand foot, and seuentie thousand horse. But the number is somewhat misse cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himselfe by the dead paies: for where he reckons nine hundred horse too many, he falls short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.

How great fouer this Muster was it seemes to haue beene like vnto that, which Lodouick Sforza made, when Leuer the welth invaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himselfe, and his subjects, hee tooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes, within the Duchie, though indeed hee were neuer able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battalles of Trebia, Trasymene, and Canna, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their slues, euen for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Canna. Wherefore the manuaile is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gauls keepe on their way: and entering into Tuscane, destroy and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the e. There were diuers nations of the Boij, as in Germania, by Germania, in South of France, and in Aquitaine; but these Boij were of the French race, & dwelt at this time about the mouth of the Rauer of Pe.

f. Cenomanni, are the people about Bergom, on the North-side of the River Po in Italie. There were also of these Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Countie of Alain.

g. Tapyges and Messapyges seeme to be one Nation, who are also called Peuce-tians, Peuce-tians, and Peuce-tians. The Countie is now Apulia, containing the Northernmost head-land of Calabria. h. A people of the kingdom of Naples. i. Polybius calls them a people of Italia. k. A people of Campania, called to this day Frentani, in Italy.

Roman Armie, sent into Tuscane, hauing taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had mislead of them, came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their iourne. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: and in the same evening discovered the Roman Armie, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessitie, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselves with a stratagem: that shewed no great fineness of wit, but such, as well befitted those that had none other occupation than warre; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not farre: leaving their horse in guard; to whom they giue order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speede, as might rather argue a running away, than a retrait, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their battie departure, as the Gauls desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gauls returne; charge them; and kill fixe thousand vpon the place; the rest take a peece of ground of aduantage, and defend themselves, till L. Aemilius, being at Arminum, comes to their succour. Vpon the coming of the Consull, the Gauls consult, whether they should giue the Romans battaile, or forbear. In which dispute, Anerocephus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to returne into their owne Countre; where, after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carriage, pester, or other impediment. This aduice 20 they all embrace; for seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoiles of their enemies; they thought it wisdome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselves, any further.

This indeede had bene a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had bene in fight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer bene found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an enemies Armie. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaies going on from the pursuing enemy, they finde within a few miles, either streight, hedge, ditch, or place of disaduantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knows it, as well as the Captaine, that he which forsakes 30 the field, perceiues, and feares some aduantage of the Enemies. Feare, which is the betrayer of those succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possessed the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and vnderstanding. They that make the retrait, are alwaies in feare to be abandoned; they that leade the way, feare to be engaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heeles that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, runne, and perish, if those that fauour the retrait, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable overthrow, that the French received in Naples, in the yeere 1503. vpon a retrait made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse, sustained the pursuing enemy a long time, and gaue the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot over-tooke, and defeated them vtterly. During the warres betweene the Imperialls, and the French, Boisland and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a brauerie would needes see the enemy, before they left the field. So was Straff overthrowne, by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arriuall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night; as many other, the most aduised Captaines, (not finding themselves in case to giue battaile) haue done. Je ne trouue point (saith the Marshall Montuc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retrait; i'inde nothing in the arte of warre so difficult, as to make a safe retrait. A sure Rule it is, that there is lesse dishonor to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la Noue giues this iudgement, of a daies retrait, made in France, presently before the battaile of Moncontour. For (saith he) staying vpon our reputation, in shew not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day: 50 whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disaduantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthy Gentleman, Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retrait at Moncontour with so great resolution, as hee faued the one halfe of the Protestant Armie, then broken and disbanded, of which my selfe was an eye-witnesse; and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turne their backs to the enemy, & their faces homeward. Aemilius followes them, as neere as he can, without ingaging himselfe, attending his aduantage. In the meane while, C. Atilius the other Consull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so 10 as the Gauls, inclosed betweene two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Reare, and Front. To sustaine Aemilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanais; in the Front, they range the Piemontais, and the rest of the Gauls inhabiting vpon the Riuer of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and so did Atilius the Consull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Comolitanus and Anerocephus, with fortie thousand of their Vassalls.

After this fatall overthrow, the Gauls lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they were invaded the yeere following this overthrow, by the 20 new Consulls, Valuius, and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to vse their victorie: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirtie yeeres time, to the Gauls, to repaire their forces, as the Gauls had done to them. These new Consulls beat the Bois; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that rained, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second yeere, Varinus, and Flaminius, invade the Milanais; and preuaile very farre, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Penetians. Neuertheless these Consulls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to religne their Office: because the Augures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their diuination, the Romans were extremely superstitious) had not 30 only foreshewed little good, when they were chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiuing letters of this reuocation, from the Senate, and being otherwise aduertised of the contents, was not hastic to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Countre; then perused the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, fore against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that hee sided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for diuiding the Countre of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, 40 that vnderstanding the Majestie of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegation, or grand Commission; did not stand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, & taught them to know and vse their power, over him selfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side, and found imitators, that rose by the same arte; which in processe of time, grew the only or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed; M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consulls, for the rest of that yeere. The Gauls about this time desired peace, and were like to haue obtained it: though the new Consulls 50 were against it, as fearing to want worke. But when thirtie thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, and joyned with the Isabrians: all other discourse, than of present warre, was at an end. So the Consulls hasted into their Prouince, where they besieged Aceris, a towne not farre from Genoua (so farre had the Romans pierced already) in the Duchie of Milan. To diuert them them from this siege, Britomarus late downe before Clasidium, a Towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces leauing the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend vpon the Consulls at Acerra, and to looke to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans breake vp their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, & fixe hundred foot lightly armed; thought to deale well enough with those at Clasidium. Britomarus heard of the Consulls comming; and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leasure to rest themselves after their iourne, but were compelled instantly to fight; Hercin Britomarus had done well; if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauerie, lost his game at a cast. He had aduantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his owne personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no lesse daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute, he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slue and disarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight, the Romans obtained a great victorie.

This was the third and last time, that euer any Roman Generall slue the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victorie, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cossus, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipio's, and diuers other Roman Captaines, especially Cesar, were better men of warre than any of these three; though they neuer offered vp to IVPITER, Opima spolia, The Armour of a Generall slaine by themselves, when they were Generalls, nor perhaps affected so to doe.

After this victorie, Acerra was yeelded to the Romans; and Milan soone after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpine, or Gauler, that dwelt in Lumbarde. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had for so many yeeres vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the Citie it selfe, brought to nothing in a short time, their pleasant and fertile Territorie posselt by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italic, so many as would not subject their neckes to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountaines, like Out-lawes and Theues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeeres, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leasure, that they closed vp the Temple of Ianus: which they neuer did before, (it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre) saue once, in the raigne of Numa; nor in long time after, vntill the raigne of Augustus. But this their present happinesse was not to last long:

a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer beene, was to come vnto their gates; which being well ended,
they might boldly vndertake, to extend their

Monarchie as farre, as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.

Of the second Punick Warre.

§. I.

10 The warres of HANNIBAL in Spaine. Quarrells between the Romans and Carthaginians.
HANNIBAL besiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilst the Romans are busied with the Ilyrians. Warre proclaimed betwene Rome and Carthage.

20 HANNIBAL, the sonne of Amilcar, was about fixe and twentie yeeres old, when hee was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. Hee was elected by the Armie, as soone as Asdrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the state at Carthage; where with Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barchas) that had command in chief, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps haue beene lesse enuied, by these domestick enemies; if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in gouernment, and beene the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generally good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilcar, in sauing his Countrie from imminent ruine, enlarging the Dominion thereof, and enriching it with treasures and great reuenues; so was it retained by the same good artes, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was vnproueable; nor to performe the like seruices vnto the Common-weale; had nothing left, whereby to value themselves, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautelous aduice of not prouoking the Romans. This they seasoned otherwhiles with detraction; saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppress the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious words were vnregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long since apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no securitie to Carthage; were thee neuer so quiet, and officious; vnlesse hee would yeeld to become their Subiect. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than vntill the Romans could find some good aduantage, to renew the Warre: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilst their owne state was in good case, the warre should beginne; than that in some vnhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driuen to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies; & to giue away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done; or miserably fight, vpon termes of disaduantage.

This disposition of his Countymen, Hannibal well vnderstood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuided of this businesse) that in making warre with the Romans, it was no small aduantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italic, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and assistance, euen of those people, that helped to increafe the Roman armies in forreigne wars. But this could neuer be effected,

sted, if the matter were openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soever they would be, to hear that he had set the war on foot, would neuertheless bee slow and timorous as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which it should happen; then were the Romans, like to be made acquainted, not only with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discussed off, in procuring allowance to his designe. This might suffice to disorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he resolved to lay siege vnto Saguntum; which might seeme not greatly to concerne the Romans; and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in mind the indignitie of that Spanish Townes alliance with their false friends. So should hee assaile both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Having thus concluded, he neuertheless went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with those that lay next in his way, approached vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (saith Liuie) to give some colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the warre against Saguntum, but had been drawne thither by course of businesse. Yet reason teacheth plainly, that without regard of such formalities, it was needfull to finish the conquest of the rest, before hee did any thing that should prouoke the Romans. First therefore he entred vpon the Territories of the Oleades; and hauing besieged Althaea (Liuie calleth it Carteia) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Master, not only thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countie. This Nation which he first vnderooke, being subdued, and the winter at hand; he reft his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagenas, and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the spoiles he had gotten in his late conquest.

In the Spring following, he pursued the warre against the Paceci: and without any great difficultie, wanne first Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, Arbucala, by assault: though not without a long siege, and great difficultie. But in his returne, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all such of the Paceci, as were able to beare armes, being made desperate by the spoile of their Countie, with those of Salamanca, and of the Oleades, that had escaped in the late ouerthrow, joining themselves with the Tolians; compounded an Armie of an hundred thousand able men: and stayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisbourn in Portugale. These foure nations, hauing had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he neuer saw enemy, vpon whom he durst not giue charge; were thoroughly resolved, that his natural valour would at this time no lesse neglect the cold aduice of discretion, than at other times it had seemed to doe, when the like great occasion perswaded him to vse it. But he that makes himselfe a bodie of Cryfall, that all men may looke through him, and discern all the parts of his disposition; makes himselfe (withall) an Asse: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or driue him. Wise men, though they haue single hearts in al that is iust and vertuous; yet they are like coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they see not all that they hold, on the sudden, and at once. It is true, that this subtil Carthaginian, when he serued vnder Asdrubal, was, of al the men of marke in the Armie, the most aduenturous. But that which may become a Capitaine, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath sometime succeeded well with such great ones, as haue bene found more fortunate, than wise. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to disseme his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himselfe from the River side, as if fearful to foord it; thereby to draw ouer that great multitude, from their banks of aduantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in such sort, as Hannibal desired that they should; thrust themselves in furie and disorder, into the swift streame, with a purpose to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defences on the contrarie side. But when Hannibal saw them in their way, and well-neare ouer; he turned backe his Elephants to entertaine them at their landing: and thrust his Horse-men, both aboue and beneath them, into the River. These carrying a kind of Lance de gy, sharpe at both ends, which they held in the middelt of the stasse; had such an aduantage ouer the foot, that were in the River, vnder their frokes, clattered together, and vnable to moue or shift their bodies, as on firme ground: that they flew all those, (in a manner) without resistance, which were already entred into the water; and pursued the rest, that fled like men amazed, with so great a laughter, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that side the River of Iberis, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift vp their hands against the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines, perceiving the danger towards them; cryed before they were hurt. They sent Embassadors to Rome, and bemoaned themselves, as likely to suffer that, which afterwards they suffered indeede; only because of their alliance and friendship with this honorable Citie, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moued the Senate: but much more a report, that Saguntum was already besieged. Hereupon some cry out, that warre should be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as also that the two Consuls should be sent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to worke; and carried it. So it was only concluded; that Embassadors should be sent into Spain, to view the state of their Confederates: which were indeede none other, than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely, that he would giue them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose; yet would it bee in their power, to determine what they liked themselves, vpon the report of these Embassadors; and this their grauitie, in being not too rash at first, would serue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadors Liuie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum; but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage; where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius, an Historian of sinceritie lesse questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagenas; and had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibals his whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Liuie confesseth) and fall to disputation about the covenants of peace; if they had rejected that which was sent vpon none other pretence, than prevention of warre.

Whilest the Embassadors passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces, but some Roman pretences, against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should do as the Mamertines in Sicili had done for the Romans; and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. This were the Turdetani; a Nation adjoining to Saguntum, and hauing many quarrells with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbourhoods) of which, Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoever it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, ere he meddled with them; he made no more ado, but sate downe with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more secure, than he had formerly been, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadors, with any trembling reuerence, as of late years they had bene wont. Neuertheless, hee was glad of any hand some colour, to shadow his actions, not only because the warre, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrarie desire. They were glad of the quarrell: as hoping, that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their own. Yet were they not halie to threaten, before they were ready to strike; but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Armie in readiness to be sent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seat of the Warre.

In

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himselfe over-10 straightly tyed vp by them, with hard conditions; or rather because he was of an vnthankfull disposition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to haue defended and aided, in all perills, even with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had receiued of their gift. But hee was a Traitor to his owne Queene; and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. First, he built ships, and spoiled the Isles of Greece: against the covenants to which he was bound. Then he aduentured further and seized 20 vpon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had staied somewhat longer, he might haue sped better. For the busines with the Gauls, was ended; with Hannibal, not thoroughly begun: when he declared himselfe, by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquished. The Roman Consul, Æmilius, was sent against him: who in seuen daies wan the strong Towne of Dimalum; and thereby brought such terror vpon the Countrey round about, that Embassadors were sent from all places, to yeeld themselves, without putting him to further paines. Only the Citie of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to resist: which it might haue done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not been too foolish.
 30 Æmilius landed a great part of his Armie, in the Isle of Pharus, by night; and bestowed them in covert; presenting himselfe the next morning, with twenty ships before the Towne, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power issued out against the Consul, and was soone intercluded from the Town, by those that lay in ambush. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a creeke, where he had shipping ready for him, and embarked himselfe: leaving all his estate vnto them, of whose liberaltie he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal late downe, ere Æmilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians, were much discouraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall receiued a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many daies vnable to moue. Neuerthelesse he was not vnmindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raise certaine moueable Towers, that might equal those which were built on the walls of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the cuitaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great & large breach was made, by the fall of diuers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Town, which vpon the first furie they had won; but they were pursued euen to their own trenches and camp. Neuerthelesse the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so wearie the townsmen with continual tra-40 uaille, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindered from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremitie, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conueyed himselfe out of the Towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered, were so leuere, & without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countreymen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had, gold, silver, plate, and other riches within the Citie: yea, the Citie it selfe to be abandoned by the Citizens; promising, that he would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carrie out with 50 them any other thing, wherewith to sustaine themselves, than the clothes on their backs; or other armes to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they farre better haue submitted themselves vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might haue enioyed their liues, & saved the honor of their wiues and daughters) daughters) than to haue rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did: by whom their wiues and daughters were deflowred before their faces; and all put to sword, that were about foureteene yeares of age. For it was a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; when not daring to fight, and sell their blood at the dearest rate, they shut themselves vp like most wretched creatures in their owne houses, and therein burnt themselves with all that they had to dying vnrueged. The treasures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therewith to pay his Armie: the slaues, and other bootie, hee diuided among his Souldiers; reseruing some things of choice, as implying this commination, to 10 friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans; who had good cause to be angry at their owne slownesse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadors againe to Carthage: demanding onely, whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre vpon Saguntum; which if they granted (as it seemed they would) then to giue them defiance. Hercunto 20 answere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect: That this their second Embassage, how soeuer qualified with mild words, was indeede more insolent than the former. For in that, they only required iustice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was virged to please guiltie, or not guiltie: But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, haue only followed his owne counsaile; or whether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to ask vs. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is; whether it were lawfull, or unlawfull, for Hannibal to doe as he hath done. For it belongs to vs, to 30 call our owne Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errours; to you, to challenge vs, if wee haue done any thing contrary to our late League and Contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Luliatius the Consul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, betwene you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that haue taught vs, how to answer that particular. For whatsoever you found in the Treatie betwene vs and Luliatius, to your owne disadvantage, you cast it vpon your Consuls presumption; as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the 40 same libertie may we also assume, and hold our selues no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere cauill. For Luliatius the Consul, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had bene therefore much better, to haue dealt plainly; and to haue alleged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Isle of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents: which perjury the state of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open 50 warre. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie, and forthwith inserted their names into the Treatie of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treatie with Asdrubal, and all other businesse betwene Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better then Roman injuries; as implying this commination, Doe whatsoever we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which wee haue already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alleage, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Luue himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Amilcar with desire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulness, as for that it was not thought conuenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warre, now towards, had long bene thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinary force; in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embassadors, to deliuer vnto them in plaine termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had beene laide in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gown-skirt both Peace and Warre: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, and purpose to embrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Euen which of them you your selfe haue a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the Assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolved to make warre, it was merely triuolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer beene maintayned by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The rustie sword, and the empty purse, doe alwaies plead performance of covenants. There haue bene few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwise understood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne aduantage; and commonly (seeing peace betwene ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing) the best aduised haue rather begonne with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henrie the second, of France, with the Imperialls, when he wrote to Brissie, to surpris as many places as he could, ere the warre brake out; Don Iohn, with the Netherlandis; and Philip, the second, of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he tooke all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the present strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries receiued from these enemies, had another private and hereditarie desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice, being ready to take his Iourney into Spaine, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischief, as soone as he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no maruail, if the impression were strong in him.

That it is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacie, it cannot be denied. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of those Kings, with whom we are now in peace, haue receiued the like charge from their Predecessors, that as soone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

HANNIBAL takes order for the defence of Spaine and Africa.
His Iourne into Italie.

Arre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolved, not to put vp his sword, which hee had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill hee had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke Warre; second to none, that euer the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthagen; where hee licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselves againe the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the gouernement of Spaine in his absence. Hee also tooke order, to send a great many troupes of Spaniards into Africa, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine; to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, hee transported into Africa thirteene thousand, eight hundred, and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the Baleares. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, a young men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine; which he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their feuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. Hee also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies; whereof thirteene were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans, and other Nations strangers, he left with him aboue twelue thousand foot, and two thousand horse, besides one and twentie Elephants.

Having in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africa; he sent Discoverers before him, to view the passages of the Pyrenean Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, & to the Gauls, to obtaine a quiet passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italie, and not be compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors, & discoverers, being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past ouer the River of Iberus, with an Armie consisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, hee now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his house, who late still at Carthage) to gouerne Spaine on the East side of Iberus; to whom he left an Armie of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arrived at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leave: which that others might not also doe, or attempt, hee courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the Iourne seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him, as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, hee past the Pyrenes, and entred into Gauls. Hee found the Gauls that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrey: but wonne them, with gentle speech, and rich presents that he bestowed vpon their Leaders, to fauour his Expedition. So without any molestation, hee came to the banke of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each side of the River, a people called Yules. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his coming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing ouer the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gauls, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Vuaretz, and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselves and their goods, into the Countrey of Daulphine, thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet such as remained, being desirous to free their Countrey of so many ill guests, were better pleased to haue their Countreimen beaten, which had abandoned them, than to haue their owne flore of corne and cattail waisted, by the long stay of so great an Armie, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates; informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the Riuier; and lent him guides. When the vessels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse; he sent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilcar, vp the Riuier: himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Pooder below. The end of this labour was: that Hanno charging the Gauls vnawares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuier in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with some difficultie; and the enemies dispersed. Yet was hee greatly troubled in conveying ouer his Elephants; who maruailously feared the water. He was therefore driuen to make rafles of trees, and couer them with earth and turf; whereof hee fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another of the same fort, but loose, vpon which the beafts were towed ouer.

Having past this first brunt, and ouer come both the rage of the Riuier, and of those that defended it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gauls Cisalpine, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; & from the selfe he receiued guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding; hee found himselfe extremely incumbered by the Sauians; and lost, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainly assailed by them, before he could recover the plaine Countries on the other side. And whereas this iourne ouer the Mountaines cost him fiftene dayes traualle, he was euery day, more or lesse, not only charged by those Mountainers, but withall, extremely beaten with grieuous weathre and snow: it being in the beginning of Winter, when he beganne, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now ready to receiue them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gauls, who by their proper forces had so often invaded the Roman Territories; gaue them great comfort, and encouragement to goe on: hauing nothing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Roman Armie; and resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vaine solicited the Spaniards and Gauls to take their part.
The rebellion of the Cisalpine Gauls against the Romans.

THe countries of Spaine and Gaul, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene solicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denouced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, tooke Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least, to diswaide them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly, they receiued by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answer. With what face (saith he) can yee Romans perswade vs to vallow your Alliance, or to preferre it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise, than so? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, haue beene vtterly rooted out, and destroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they

they might else haue held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Yee may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answer for the rest of our Countreimen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindestie at our hands: who are resolved, neuer to make accompt of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadors tooke their way towards the Gauls; vling their best arguments to perswade them, not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italie, through their Territories: and withall greatly glorifying themselves, their strength, and large Dominion. But the Gauls laugh't them to scorn, and had hardly the patience, to heare them speake. For shall we (said one of their Princes) by resisting Hannibals passage into Italie, entertaine a war which is not meant to be made against vs? Shall we hold the warre among our selues, and in our owne Territories, by force, which marcheth with a speedy pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Haue the Romans deserved so well of vs, and the Carthaginians so ill, that wee should set fire on our owne houses, to saue theirs from burning? No, wee know it well, that the Romans haue already forced some Nations of ours, out of their proper Territories and inheritance; and constrained others, as free as themselves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies; who haue no way as yet offended vs, nor we them.

With this vnpleasing answer the Embassadors returned home: carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather some assurance from the people of Mysilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gauls were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gauls gaue hastie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italie, that the Carthaginians had passed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone sufficed to stirre vp the Boii, and Insubrians, against the Romans. These people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremena, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian succour, which they supposed to be now at hand; they laid aside all regard of those hostages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it seemed that they could not winne; for Hannibal shortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Country) to flee to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gauls, hauing little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed wearie, and seemed desirous to haue peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeeme their hostages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadors to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained. Manlius the 40 Praetor, who lay in these quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage, marched in all haste to the reliefe of the besieged. But the Gauls, hauing laid a strong ambush in a wood ioyning to the way, fell vpon the Praetor so opportunely, as he was vtterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recovered by fast running a little village, but defensible, vpon the Riuier of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Praetors, was hastily sent, to relieve the besieged, with one Legion, and five thousand of the Roman associates: which forces were taken out of the Consuls Armie, and supplied by a new leuie.

As the Gauls were too rash and hattie: so were the Romans too slow, and indeede too ill-advised, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perswaded, that lies, of five to an Oare; which preparation may seeme to threaten euen the Citie of Carthage, to which it shall not come neere. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Prouence; and vled such diligence, hauing the winde also fauourable, as in five dayes he recovered Masilia. There hee was aduertised, of Hannibal his hauing passed the Riuer of Rhodanus; whom hee thought to haue found bulle yet awhile in Spaine. Hannibal had also newes of the Consuls arriual: whereof he was neither glad, nor sorry; as not meaning to haue to doe with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts, to discover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman foot. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly bragge, hauing slaine only two hundred, and lost of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew neere, to haue met with the Carthaginians, he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as hee then found assuredly true) with an intent to looke vpon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended voyage into Spaine. Neuertheless hee sent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Armie, to trie what might bee done against Asdrubal and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie. He himselfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Pisa; and so passing through Tuscanie into Lunbardie, drew together the broken troupes of Marcius and Atilius, that lately had bene beaten by the Gaules: with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull iourne.

50 Carthage, which had almost feruently endured so many indignities, in time of the late peace; would be so braue and courageous on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italie it selfe. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Africk: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Africk, with an hundred & threethreecore Quinquereemes, or Gallies,

§. III.

Scipio the Roman Consul over-come by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battaile at Trebia.

Hue moneths Hannibal had spent in his tedious iourne from Carthage; what great muster he could make, when hee had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Somer reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to haue bene only twenty thousand foot, and fixe hundred horse. Hannibal himselfe, in his Monument which he raised, in the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter summe. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to haue mightily increased his Armie, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all saue those remembered by himselfe in the Inscription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue perished, by diseases, enemies, Riuers, and Mountaines; which mischiefs had deuoured, each, their severall shares.

Hauing newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Armie in the Countrie of Piemont, he sought to winne the friendship of the Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Insubrians, which were his good friends; and refused (perhaps for the same cause) his amitie. Wherefore he assaulted their Towne; and wannet by force in three dayes. Their spoile serued well to hearten his Armie; and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more ado, fell vnto his side: many for feare, many for good-will, according to their former inclination. This disposition ranne through the whole Countrie: which joyned, or was all in a readinesse to joyne, with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Consul his arriual, made some to be more aduised, than the rest. The name of the Romans was terrible in those quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Consul was already gotten through the most defensible passages, ere any speech had been heard of his approach: many fate still, for very feare, who else would haue concluded a League with these new-come friends; and some, for greater feare, offered their seruice against the Carthaginians, whom neuertheless they wished well to speede.

This wavering affection of the Prouince, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals haften to the trial of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondered at the others great expedition: Hannibal thinking it strange, that the Consul, whom he had left behind him on the other side of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before hee had well warmed himselfe in the Plaines, Scipio admiring the strange aduerture of passing those Mountaines, and the great spirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed, at Hannibals successe, and sudden arriual. Wherefore they dispatched a Messenger in all haste vnto Sempronius, the other Consul, that was then in Sicilia, giuing him to vnderstand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had bene directed to make the warre in Africa, it was now their pleasure that hee should forbear to prosecute any such attempt, but that hee should returne the Armie vnder his charge, with all possible speede, to saue Italie it selfe. According to this order, Sempronius sent off his Fleet from Liubium, with direction to land the Armie at Ariminum, a Port Towne not farre from Rauenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haste. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come so neere, that fight they must ere they could part asunder. Hereupon, both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the best arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a present example, that he shewed vpon certaine prisoners of the Savoyans, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpose, into Italie. For these, hauing bene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to be deliuered from their miseries by any kind of present death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, till the one of them were slaine, with condition being the Victor, to recieue his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to vse in single combats. Euery one of these vnhappy men wished, that his owne lot might speede, whereby it should at least be his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resolutely: as rather desiring, than fearing death; and hauing none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoever vncertain termes, to ridde themselves out of slaueerie. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victorie had gotten his libertie, together with an horse and armour: but euen him also, who being slaine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiving what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, beganne to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done: all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grieuous) to liue in a perpetuall slaueerie: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight; since the Mountaines, the Ri-

a These dwell about Turin, a goodly City, now subiect vnto the Duke of Savoy which from them tooke the name of Augustaurinorum.

uers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercileffe Enemies, must needs retrench all such impotent imaginations. He therefore praised them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had euer been broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, he told them, that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, and in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waies to saue themselves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaime such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessity, (to which nothing seemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constraime them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no meane betwene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For (saith a great Captaine of France) la commodite de la retraite aduance la suite; The commoditie of a retreat, doth greatly aduance a flat running away.

Scipio, on the other side, after that he had giuen order for the laying of a bridge ouer the Riuer of Ticinus, did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons hee could, to encourage the Armie he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had preuailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not only so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Thebes, than an Armie like to encounter the Romans; but so weather-beaten, and fluried, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (said he) yee your selues may make iudgement what daring they haue now remaining, after so many traualles and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Rhone, their horse-men were not only beaten by ours, and driuen backe to the very Trenches of their Campe, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approach, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people, both in Africa, and in Siell.

It was not long after this, ere the two Generalls met: each being farre aduanced before the grosse of his Armie, with his Horse; and the Roman hauing also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discouered the approach one of the other, Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gauls, to beginne the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the void ground betweene their troupes, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes, following softly in good order. The Gauls (whether desirous to trie the metall of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselves courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, shrank at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart; for feare, of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gauls maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they received; as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consul vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardiess deseruing his aide; and the halfe flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore hee aduanced himselfe so farre, that hee receiued a dangerous wound; and had beene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue, to a Ligurian slave. Whilest the Romans were busied in helping their Consul; an vnexpected storme came drining at their backs, and made them looke about how to helpe themselves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to giue vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compass them about, whilest he with his men at armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in peeces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this inuersion, the Romans were shuffled together, and rowed: so that they all betooke them to their speede, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horse thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; hee thought it a point of wildome, hauing lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extremest of the tempest ouer-tooke him. For he saw by the lowering morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, hee in a manner stole the retreat; and recovered the bridge ouer Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left fixe hundred of his Reare behinde him: who were the last that should haue passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quandoq; dabim vi deat: tacitam miles arripit fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this sort; If a General of an Armie, by some vnprofitable beginnings doubt the successe; or find his Armie fearefull or wauering; it is more profitable to steale a safe retreat, than to abide the vncertaine enent of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the Riuer; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and calling himselfe of his wound in Placentia. Euen soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their campe; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Anserius, Britomarus, and the Gessates, were come to helpe them; if they had the hearts to helpe themselves. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman campe; wounded and slue many; especially of those guards that kept watch at the gates; with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians, and presented their seruice. Hannibal receiued them exceeding courteously, and dismist them to their owne places: as men likely to be of more vse to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consul stole a retreat, as hee had done before; but not with the like ease and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him; and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him: following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had receiued a great blow, if the Numidians, greedie of spoile, had not staid to ransack their campe; and thereby giuen time to all, saue some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the Riuer of Trebia, and saue themselves. Scipio, being both vnable to traualle by reason of his wound, and withall finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Consul; incamped himselfe strongly vpon the banks of Trebia. Necessary required that he should so doe; yet this diminished his reputation. For every day, more & more of the Gauls sel to the Carthaginian side; among whome came in the Boii, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken in the late Insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as Pledges, to redeeme their owne Hostages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose helpe they conceived better hope of recovering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of vittuals, attempted the taking of Clefidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid up all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundisian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a litle monie.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather ther with a desire of haffie reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse receiued; seeing that, in a manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore halted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent out of Sicili, awaited his coming. He therefore halted hither; and from thence hee marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joynd in one, the Consuls deuised about that which remained to be done: Sempronius receiuing from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibal: arriual; the fortune of the late fight; and by what error or misadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the reuolt and treason 10 of the Gauls.

Sempronius, hauing receiued from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts; sought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recouered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victorie, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. He also feared the election of the new Consuls: his owne time being well-nere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrary; objecting the vnskillfulness of the new-come Soldiers: and withall gaue him good reason, to assure him that the Gauls, naturally vnconstant, were vpon termes of abandoning the partie of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting betwene the Riuers of Trebia, and Po, being already reuolted. 20 Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the dishonour, which he might otherwise easily haue auoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time. For the strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; he no lesse feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions mouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gauls inhabiting nere vnto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that 30 they might haue done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at libertie, he had vndertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to bee his owne Caruer; and tooke from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they flie to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to ioyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this: he suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honor of Rome, to prelerue the Confederates from suffering iniurie: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore he sent out a thousand horse: which coming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heauy laden cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest euen into their owne campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians fallie out against them: who caused them to retire faster then they came. Sempronius was readie to back his owne men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all the Roman Armie was drawne forth; and a battaile readie to bee fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victorie (for so the Consul would haue it called) made the Romans in generall desirous to try the maine chance in open field: all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was aduertised by the Gauls, his spies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought himselfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding some stratagem to his forces: Hee found in the hollow of a water-course, ouer-growne with high reede, a fit trench trench to couer an ambush. Thereto he call his brother Asago, with a thousand choice horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Armie, after they had well warmed and well fed themselves in their campe, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, he had sent ouer Trebia some companies of Numbian light-horse: to braue the enemy, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight: and therefore not onely issued out of his campe, but foorded the Riuier of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of foode, did so enicble and coole their courages, as they 10 wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: hauing of the one, sixteene, of the other, twentie thousand. The masse of these they ranged in a grosse Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse; thrusting their light-armed, and Darters, in loose troupes in the head thereof, in the nature of a Vanguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equall to their enemies; in horse, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodnesse. When therefore the Roman horse, ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numbians; when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gauls, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares prest in the Rear, by Asago and his two 20 thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush: then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies swords; and being beaten downe, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the Riuier, by the horse-men that pursued them, there escaped no more of fixe and thirtie thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errors Sempronius committed, of which euery one deserved to be recompenced with the losse that followed. The first was, that hee fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferiour in horse, and withall thereby subiect to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or vn-euen grounds, and woodlands, would haue bene of no vse. His second error was, that he made no discouerie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was grossly ouer-reacht, and 30 insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee drencht his foot-men with emptie stomachs, in the Riuier of Trebia, euen in a most cold and frostie day, whereby in effect they lost the vse of their limbs. For as one saith well; There is nothing more inconvenient and perillous, than to present an Armie tyred with trauaile, to an enemy fresh and fed; since where the strength of bodie faileth, the generositie of minde is but as an vnprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; stealing away the same night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians; who either perceiued him not, because of the shewes; or 40 would not perceiue him, because they were ouer-weared. Sempronius escaped with extreme danger; flying through the Countie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horse. Hee was attended by more, than were requisite in a secret flight; yet by fewer, than could haue made resistance, if the enemy had met with him. Neuertheless he got away, and came to Rome, where hee did his office in choosing new Consuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Prouince, with a fresh supply against Hannibal.

2. V.

The departure of HANNIBAL from the Cisalpine Gaules into Hetruria.FLAMINIUS the Roman Consul slain; and his Armie destroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Trasymene.

THe Winter growing on apace, was very sharpe, and vsfit for seruice : to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe 10 the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not suffer them to rest very quiet : but vexed them with continuall alarmes ; assailing diuers places ; taking some ; beating the Gaules their adherents ; and winning the Lygurijs to his partie, who presented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Roman Questors or Treasurers, two Colonels, and fise Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loden with yrons, and miserably fed : those of their followers he not onely well entreated, but sent them to their Countries without ranfome ; with this protection, That he therefore vndertooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the 20 oppression of the Romans. By these means he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such persuasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countrie the seat of the Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieved than reason willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life ; others admonished him of the danger ; and these that gaue him the aduice, were readie soone after to practise against him ; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colors, to the end that he might not be described, nor known, to those that should vndertake to make him away. Faine hee would haue passed 30 the Apennines, vpon the first appearance of Spring ; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarrie among the Gaules, till he had scene more Swallows than one. At length, when the yeare was somewhat better opened, he resolved to take his leaue of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre neerer to the gates of Rome. So away hee went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules ; more seruiceable friends abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Apennine Mountaines was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way : the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when hee was trauielling through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the 40 extremities of Winter, that makes all wayes foule, than to any intolerable difficulty in that iourne. Neuertheless to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance and fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue beene erected vpon the ordinarie passages towards Rome : he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to traualle through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscanie. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes ; by the moistnesse of the aire, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deepe mire and water. In bricfe, after hee had with much adoe recovered the firme and fertile Plaines, he lodged about Arretium : where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the 50 Roman Consuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Seruilius had of late bene chosen Consuls for this yeere : Seruilius, a tractable man, and wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate ; Flaminius, an

an hot-headed popular Orator ; who hauing once bene robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a deuce of the Senators, was afraid to be serued to againe, vnlesse he quickly finished the warre. This jealous Consul thought it not bett for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, lest his adueraries, by saying some religious impediment, should detain him within the Citie, or find other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that hee hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Towne ; and meant to take possession of his Office, when the day came, at Arretium. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, reuoked him by Embassadors : but he neglected their injunction, and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, tooke his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therefore he prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman : hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Seruilius came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countrie betwene Fegula and Arretium he put to fire and sword, euen vnder the Consuls nose ; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not haue sitten still, though Hannibal had bene quiet. It is true, that a great Captaine of France hath said ; Pays gaste c'este pas perdu ; A wasted Countrie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour 20 to be much impaired ; and therefore aduanced towards the Enemy. Many aduised him (which had indeede bene best) to haue patience awhile, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to heare : saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilst the Carthaginians went, burning downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he tooke horse ; and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensignes stucke so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Ensigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tullie makes a jeat : saying, that the cowardly knaue did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) hauing hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto : for he commanded, that it should be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weak to lift it : asking with- 30 all ; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this jealousie both hee, and the Senate that gaue him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Trasymene, was on a light fire, which whilst the Consul thought to quench with his enemies bloud, he pursued Hannibal so vnadvisedly, that he fell, with his whole Armie, into an ambush cunningly laid for him, betwene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was he charged vnawares, on all sides, (saue only where that great Lake of Perusia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flee from them) knowing 40 not which way to turne, or make resistance. So was hee slain in the place, accompanied with fiftene thousand dead carcases of his Countymen. About fixe thousand of his men, that had the Vantgard, tooke courage as for the most part happens, out of desperation ; and breaking through the enemies, that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountaines. If these had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by necessitie, had wrought the effects of hardinesse ; was well allwaged, when they ceased to despair, of saving their liues by flight. They stood still, in a could sweat, vpon the Hill-top ; hearing vnder them a terrible noise, but not dis- 50 couering how things went, because of the great fogge that held all the morning. When it grew toward noone, the aire was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellows. But they said not to lament it : for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were descried, and attached by the enemies horse. This they should have thought vpon sooner; since they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For desiered they were, and Maharbal sent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which hee surrounded with his horse: and so they yeilded the next day, rendring their armes, vpon his promise of their liues and liberties. This accord Hannibal refused to confirme; saying, that it was made by Maharbal, without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein hee taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargain; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and bee limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal bee as Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that peridioussesse gaineth no more in prosperitie, than it looseth in the change of fortune. Fiftene thousand Italian Prisoners, or thereabout, hee had in his hands: of which all that were not Romans, hee set free without rancome; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had undertaken this warre. But the Romans hee kept in straight prison, and in fetters; making them learne to eate hard meate. This was a good way, to breede in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this warre had not concerned the generall safetie, but only the preserving of her owne neck from the yoke of slaerie, which her ouer-strong enemies would thrust vpon her in reuenge of her oppressions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by successe of many ages, is not lost in one or two batailles. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginian can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battaile of Thrasymene, C. Centronius, with foure thousand Roman horse, drew neere vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was sent from Ariminum, by Serullius the other Consul, to increate the strength of Flaminius: but coming too late, hee increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this companie; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeilded to mercie, the next day. Serullius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gauls; against whom hee had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Collegues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popularie loue, which perswaded the Romans to the yeerely change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errors, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had bin taken vp but the yeere before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet lusted hee himselfe to be caught loone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to be preuented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honour of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would hee not, contrarie to all good aduice, haue beene so hasty to fight, before the arriuall of Serullius. If Sempronius had beene continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Government of France ten yeeres, Cesar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Helmetians and many of the Germans, vnder the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene euery yeere a new Lieutenantant, the

would hardly, if euer, haue beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Riuer, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly lett their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wife, as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they beganne but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Government, sitting the Countrie, they haue beene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great preiudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath euer beene the course of the World, rather to follow old errors, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouvernours, to vp-hold their slothfull ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and peoples; though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

§ VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal; by lingering warre. Minutius, the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successfull attempting, aduenturing rashly vpon Hannibal; and is like to perish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

Greatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparent; which threatened them in more terrible manner, than euer did warre, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receiue an ouerthrow; that when Pyrrius had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italie was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrius his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee only fought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a brauerie: demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name; against which hee burned with desire of reuenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, and his abilitie. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long bene out of vse, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subject vnto controul of the whole Citie. Wherefore this Officer was seldom chosen, but vpon some extremitie, and for no longer time than fixe moneths. He was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if hee stood vpon his prerogative) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one Consul being dead, and the other too farre off; the People tooke vpon them, as hauing supreme authoritie, to giue the Dignitie by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus, the best reputed man of warre in the Citie, Quorum saluum, novum consilium expetit; Contrariis ventis, contrarie consules. Q. Fabius chose M. Minutius Consul Master of the horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion bene also good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gave direction in this businesse of deuotion; then must we beleue, that those bookes of Sybil, preferred in Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified; as hauing not been rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with other such trumperie. This

vehementie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehementie of feare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly dis tempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sonnes returne alive from Thrasymene, may serue to beare witness: though it bee more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the Citie were now repaired and fortified: the bridges vpon Riuer were broken downe, and all care taken, for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal; word was brought, that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Serulius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome, and Offia, to pursue them: whilst he, with the Legions, attended vpon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had leued in halfe: and from Ariminum he receiued the Armie, which Serulius the Consul had conducted thither.

With these forth-with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Namidian horse had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard access. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrey, and used all manner of crueltie towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to beare armes. Passing by Spoleum and Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trauailed Companies; armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans; and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that hee had gotten. Having refreshed his Armie; fed his horses; cured his wounded Souldiers; and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heeles of the scratches, by walking their paterines in old wine: he followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Province of the Kingdome of Naples; spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ranne, he had not taken any one Citie: only he had assailed Spoleum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer.

The malice of a great Armie is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poitiers, a little before the battaile of Moncontour; and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S. Iean à Angeley. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprize, as should detain him, and giue the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once hee was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, as soone as he saw him; and provoked him with all manner of brauado's. But Fabius would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betwene Souldiers bred vp, euer since they were Boyes, in warre and in bloud, trayned and hardened in Spain, made proud and aduenturous by many victories there, and of late by some notable acts against the Romans; and such, as had no other scene the enemy, than bin vanquished by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian so neere, as he kept him from straggling too farre; and preserved the countrey from vtter spoile. He injured his men by litle and litle, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and hee brought them first to looke on the Lyon a farre off, that in the end they might sit on his taile.

Now Minutius had a contrarie disposition, and was as fierce as Flamininus; taxing Fabius with cowardise and feare. But all stirred not this well-advised Commander. For wise men are no more moued with such noise, than with winde bruised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion, and danger; than to pursue misfortune: It waiteth it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the invading Armie that desires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading, and the the victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apennines, and to fall vpon the most rich and pleasant Territories of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to aduenture the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weak in horse, he alwaies kept the Hills and fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this warie Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on; and that the towns stood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in sight, though a farre off; he resolved to rest his Armie, that was laden with spoile, in some plentiful and assured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the Hills of Callicula, and Caslinum: for other way there was none, by which hee might issue out of that goodly Garden-countrey, which hee had already walked, into places more abundant of prouision for his wintering. It was by meere error of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would haue bin directed vnto Caslinum, whence he might both assay the faire Citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises vnder hand, and hinder the Romans from comming neere it to preuent him. But his guide mis-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Caslinum to Casilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now beganne the wisdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, & wonne the victorie, without blowes.

But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a slight inuention, yet seruing the turne as well as a better. In driving the countrey, hee had gotten about two thousand Kine; whose hornes he dressed with drie faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driuen vp the Hills. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be the worke of a terrible enemy. What it should meane, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill-tops, were horribly afraid, when some of these fierce Monsters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs, and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no lesse afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recovered sure ground, without molestation: where he stayed till the next morning; and then brought off his light footmen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirnish: After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his iourne towards Rome: and the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, between him and the Citie, whilst the Carthaginian waited all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Towne in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, and incamped vnder the broken walls. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time past idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome; about some businesse of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius, the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiencie. Hee was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had beene foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtiltie & ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to preuent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred by iudgement of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this iollitie of conceit, hee determined to fight. Yet had hee bene peremptorily forbidden so to doe, by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreme perill of death. But the honour of the victorie, which hee held vndoubtedly his owne; the loue of the Armie; and the friends that hee had at home beating Office in Rome, were enough to faue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer so bairnously. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a more aduenturous gamester. Therefore hee drew neere: and to prouoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Armie to waste the Countrey, Countrie. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him; but it seemed, that hee now despised those whom hee had so often vanquished. There was a peece of high ground betwene the two camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians seized vpon by night with two thousand of their light armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wanne it from them the next day; and entrenching himselfe thereupon, became their nearer neighbour.

The maine businesse of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not onely for his men, but for his horses, which hee knew to bee the chiefe of his strength; that he might keepe them in good heart all the next Summer: if besides this he could giue the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, encourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his campe, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harueft. This aduantage Minutius wisely espied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and setting it in order presented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horse, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, hee sent abroad against the forragers; who being disperfed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no resistance. This angered Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worke did it anger him, when the Romans tooke heart to assaile his Trenches. They perceiued that it was meere weakenesse, which held him within his campe, & therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the businesse, Asdrubal came from Geryon with foure thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horfe. This emboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom neuerthelesse hee did not such hurt, as hee had receiued.

For this peece of seruice Minutius was highly esteemed by the Armie, & more highly by the People at Rome; to whom hee sent the newes, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Armie had recovered 30 spirit, so farre forth that it dared to set vpon Hannibal in his owne campe; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Euery man therefore praised the Master of the horfe, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as farre out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that hee had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: sauing that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeede in no other thing hee had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyfull of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. Hee said that hee knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Master of the horfe to doe so likewise, and make him giue account of what he had done, if hee were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good successe, issuing from bad counsaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence; the other taught men to be warie. Against these Sermons euery one cryed out; especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to speake, and doe what he list, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be General, and Lord of the Towne, in our greatest necessitie, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italie to bee wasted before his eyes, to the vtter shame of our State; vnlesse he also hinder others, from doing better than himselfe can, or dares? It were good to consider what hee means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius hee hath not chosen any new Consul all this 40 while; Servilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and Hee, haue as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had intendede forborne to spoile some grounds of Fabius, that so hee might bring him into enuie & suspicion) & the Dictator giuing him leaue to spoile all others, without impeachment.

peachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would haue the warre to last long, that he himselfe might be long in Office, and haue the sole Government both of our Citie, and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authoritie, should againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But left, in mouing the people hereto, I should seeme to doe him iniurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Master of the Horfe may be joyued in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessarie, than was the electing of this Dictator, by the People.

10 Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so injurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publike, was lesse than very honourable. Whereas the refore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit and authority, besides the Propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that Dignitie, whose great power had freed the State at severall times, from the greatest dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had bene Prætor, was glad of such an opportunity, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher; afterwards became a shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbings, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Offices, and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very basenesse. And now hee thought the time was come, for him to giue an hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So hee made an hot inuestiue, not only against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, that it grieved them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Government; that they sought to 30 humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impoverish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would soone consume euery poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore hee bade them to be wise: and since they had found one, (this worthy Master of the horfe) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrie, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authoritie, accordingly as was propounded by the Tribune, that so hee might be encouraged and enabled, to proceede as hee had begunne. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consul, which was M. Attilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius; and hauing 40 finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiving well, that he should not be able to withstand the Multitude, in hindering the Decree. The newes of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, beganne to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to diuide their authoritie: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them, successiue, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horfe equal to the Dictator; but that hee should neuer be his superiour: He would therefore diuide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie hee could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuerthelesse hee meant to doe his best; and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and an halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Luie seeme to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two severall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto the other, nor joynd ned in Commission, but haue each entire & absolute charge of his owne followers there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one campe shall not hold them both, without great inconuenience. Polybius neither finds fault with this disfunction; nor yet reports, that Fabius was vnwilling to command in chiefe successfullly (as the two Consuls vsed) with Minutius, by turns. Hee saith that Minutius was very refractarie; and so proud of his aduancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to diuide the forces betwene them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to bee true. For naturall impatience of subjection, when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authority, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the prooffe and assurance of their libertie.

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse careful, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of auoiding the necessitie. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Countreylieing betwene them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoining, had many, and spacious caues; able, some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discovered. But leit by any misaduenture they should be found out, and buried in their holes, he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a peece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which, not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduventure vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as hee got it, hee sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (keing that Hannibal seconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) hee followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught; and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safer retreat. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves, loosing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew neere, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine, perceiving a farre off, into what extremitie his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe, and his followers; did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approve himselfe by hastning to doe good, than by suffering his enemy to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retyred: fearing to be well wetted with a shewre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forth with submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit hee confessed his life to haue beene faued. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would haue it; both whilst his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neuer within kenning. Hee ranne along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corficans; passed ouer into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoile the Countreie, was shamefully beaten aboard his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, hee returned home by Sicily; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consul, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

§. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and vnworthy Consul. Great forces sent against HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL saith the Romans prouisions in the Castle of Canne. The new Consuls set forth against HANNIBAL.

With little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, heare the great commendations, that were giuen to Fabius by the principal Citizens. He had indeed preferred them from receiving a great overthrow: but he had neither finished the warre, nor done any thing in apparence thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome; since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance, as if it were honorable to doe nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were readie every man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his own priuate losse, vpon the ill administration of the publike.

This affection of the people, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Cominaltie were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinsman, Bibius Horrensius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vse the libertie of his place: in saying what he liked, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stuck not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawn into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; that Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to haue beene overthrowne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had al been joyned together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minutius, when he commanded ouer al as Master of the horse; that without a Plebeian Consul, the warre would neuer be brought to an end; that such of the Plebeians, as had long since been aduanced to honour by the people, were grown as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meaner sort, euer since themselves were freed from contempt of the more mightie; that therefore it was needfull to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could with more, than to keep it, by well deferring of them. By such persuasions, the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honor; and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fel out, or at least was allaged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose: and he againe deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in choice of the new Consuls. This Inter-regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. At the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselves into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successfullly, by the space of five daies, one Decurie after another in order yet so, that the Lictors, or Vigilers, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls; and put in vse, when by death, or any casualtie, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeare following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would haue it, there needed no more, than to let slip five daies; & then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well alluaged. Vpon such change of those, that were Presidents of the Election; it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to sue for the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they should publickly declare themselves to seeke those Offices. But no device would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer; and the malice of the Fathers; against the vertue (as it was believed) of this meane, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, only Terentius was chosen Consul: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Herevpon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinary mark had stood for the place before; it was now though meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiencie, and reputation, should be joynt with him, as both Companion and opposit. So L. Aemilius Paulus, he who few yeares since had ouercome the Illyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobility to stand for the place; which he easily obtained, hauing no Competitor. It was not the desire of this honourable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good seruice; He, and M. Linius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards inuiously vexed by the People, and called vnto judgement: wherein Linius was condemned, and Aemilius hardly escaped. But of this iniustice they shall put the Romans well in minde each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grieuous losse; the other brauely winning, in the most happie victorie, that euer befall that Common-wealth.

The new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greater noise, by telling what wonders he would worke, and that hee would aske no more, than once to haue a fight of Hannibal, whom he promised to vanquish the very first day; yet the prouidence and care of Paulus, traualled more earnestly toward the accomplishment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boasted. He wrote vnto the two old Consuls Seruilus and Attilius, desiring them to abstaine from hazard of the maine chance; but neuertheless, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmish, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague should take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might find the foure old Legions well accustomed to the Enemy, and the Enemy well weakened to their hands. He was also very strict in his Musters; wherein the whole Senate assisted him so carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the slanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raised it is vncertaine. Four-score thousand foot, at the least, and sixethousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Here, the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their owne Mercenaries; so did he now send helpe to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his owne estate would fall to ruine; that stood vpright, by hauing them somewhat euenly balanced. He gaue them also counsaile, to send forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that meanes they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and good aduice were louingly accepted; and instructions were giuen to Titus Octavius the Pretor, which was to goe into Sicily, that he should accordingly passe ouer into Africa, if he found it expedient.

The

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more serue to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawne into the field, and fitted for seruice. For besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicily, twentie five thousand, with L. Posthumus Albinus another of the Pretors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength, might well embolden them to do as they did. They sent Embassadors to Philip the sonne of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius; who hauing been their subiect, and rebel, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was alreadie past. What answer they receiued, it is not knowne: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth beganne to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian monie; by the shifte that they were driuen soone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little soeuer) would haue bene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauil about forfeiture for non payment of the whole.

Whilst the Citie was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as neere vnto Hannibal, as possibly as they could, without incurring the necessitie of a battaile. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their success for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other seruices, but was indeed the occasion, to draw on the miserie following. Hannibal, for the most part of that time, made his lodge at Geryon, where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him lodged about Cannusium; and, that they might not be driuen to turne aside for all necessities, to the losse of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Cattle of Canna: for the town was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal wanne, and thereby not only furnished himselfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vnlesse they would be troubled with farre carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himselfe to abide in that open Countrey, fit for the seruice of his horse: longer then the Romans, hauing so many mouthes to feed, could well endure to tarrie; without offering battaile; which he most desired. Of this mishap when Seruilus had informed the Senate, letting them vnderstand, how this Peere, taken by Hannibal, would serue him to command no small part of the Countrey adjacent; it then seemed needfull, euen vnto the Fathers themselves, to aduenture a battaile with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take roote in the ground of Italy. Neuertheless, answer was returned vnto Seruilus, that hee should haue patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a power sufficient to doe as things were required.

When all things were readie in the Citie, and the season of the yeere commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their armie set forth against Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great solemnitie: especially, when soeuer they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good success and victorie: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, not only such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Voluntaries, for loue, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home, were accompanied on their way, & dismissed with friendly leaue-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited vpon Aemilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honor, or likely to do his countrey remarkable seruice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no lesse in greatnes, than the other was in dignitie. At the partings Fabius the late Dictator, is said to haue exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many graue words, to shew his magnanimitie, not only

onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outrageous follie of his fellow. Consul. The answer of Paulus was, That hee meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his best for his cuntry: but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would thinke it lesse rashnesse to aduenture vpon the Enemies sword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

¶ VIII.

Diffension betweene the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that HANNIBAL was vpon point of flying out of Italie, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battaile of Cannæ.

THese new Generals, arriuing at the Camp, dismissed M. Atilius one of the last yeares Consuls, requesting it becaule of his age and weakenes: Servilius they retained with them, as their Assistant. The first thing that Æmilius thought necessarie, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad successe hitherto, had gathered more caule of feare, than of courage. Hee willed them to consider, not only now, their victories in times past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their own great numbers: which were no 20 lesse than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. Hee told them in what danger their COUNTRY stood; how the state and safety thereof rested vpon their hands; vsing some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectual part of his Oration was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victorie by plaine force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconsiderate rashnesse of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, vntill he was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darknesse whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally, de- 30 claring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helps, by which he had hitherto preuailed against them; hee exhorted them to play the men, and doe their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them caule to thinke, that vnder a Capitaine so well experienced, and euery way sufficient, as Æmilius was knowne to bee, they should easily preuaile against the Carthaginians: that came farre short of them in all things else, saue craft; which would not alwaies thrive. But in one thing they mistooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his desire that they should haue heart to fight; 40 not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a conuenient season. But they, hauing preconceiued a victorie, thought all delays to be impediments: and thereby fought to robbe themselves of their best helpe; which was good conduct. They remembered what take they had heard at Rome; and were themselves affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein since Æmilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them forbear to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Terentius; who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than he had been in the Citie. Expectation is alwaies tedious; and neuer more, than when the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who hastned their desire to effect, was likely to winne more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselves to haue the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconuenience, than which few are more dangerous; Diffension of

of their chiefe Commanders, Varro would fight: Æmilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time; why? becaule the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, hauing eaten vp his last yeares provisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Haruest? This would (said Varro) fauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth fauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their decrees were like their words: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably euery day. Æmilius lodged fixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Tither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; hee doubted not to send them away in such haile, as they should not leaue running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuerthelasse he fate downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden guest gaue him but a rude wel come and entertainment. The Carthaginians in Horle, and light Armature, fol vpon the Roman Vant-courers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilest it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Pelites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not hand somly withdraw the Army out of that leuel ground; incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus; sending a third part of his forces ouer the wa- 20 ter, to lie vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselves. Hee neuer was more vnwilling to fight, than at this present: becaule the ground serued wholly for the aduantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equal termes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove toward Geryon, Cannæ, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessities: whereof an Armie foraging the country, was not likely to carrie about with it sufficient quantitie, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Luie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the miserie into which Hannibal had been driuen; and of base courses that he deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. He had (saith Luie) but ten daies provision of meat. He had not monie to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruely Rabble, gathered out of severall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were readie to forsake him, and runne ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne away into Gaul with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lacke of all other counsaile, he resolved to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithfull Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early haruest. But whilest he was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him vnto that, which hee most desired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaigne ground: wherein hee was victorious: It was not vncommendable in Luie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and; where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus hee saith; HANNIBAL de fugâ in Galliam [dicitur] aggrâsse. HANNIBAL [it said] to haue bethought himselfe of flying into Gaul: where he makes it no more then a matter of heare-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the proccesse it selfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaul, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victualles enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Summer forgoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeare; especially seeing he had plaid the careful husband in making a great haruest; since he had long bene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans provisions: Sutable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattails; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his stock, since he came into that Countrey, that hee had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and laden his followers with spoile: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians: who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That hee alwaies kept his Armie free from sedition, though it were composed of sundrie Nations; no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so doe, hauing not only pronounced, That which of his men fouer fought brauely with an Enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested and sworne, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaul, was a senselesse deuce. Hannibal, being there with his whole Armie, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrey and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now doe there with his horse? or how could hee bee trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to liue; hauing betrayed all his Army; and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omiteth; who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Livy. But of this and the like it is enough to say, That all Historians loue to extoll their owne countreines; and where a losse cannot be difsembled, nor the honour of the victorie taken from the Enemy, and giuen vnto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgovernment of their own forces: as if they might easily haue wonne all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to find in them another time.

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lie encamped on the River Ausidus. Varrus was perswaded, that it concerned him in honor, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome; and since he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vse his owne authority; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of day he beganne to passe the River, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and sought, as in former times, to haue dissuaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrey to a needlesse hazard. Against whose wordes and substantiall arguments, Terentius could allege none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battail at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians ouer the River but euen the day before, who sel vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesse Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to assaile: must this also be suffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of such courage, as promised assured victorie. When Emilius perceived, that he could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion; heooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behind, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might bee compelled, to leaue behind him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucity he was lesse able to spare from the battail, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight beganne, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heate of fight. This done; the two Consuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the lesse Camp, whence whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battail: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and, without any delay, passed likewise ouer, somewhat higher vp the streame, which ranne from the South; leauing in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men, He bade them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said he) pray for any greater fortune, than to ioyne battail with the Romans vpon such a leuell ground, where the stronger in horse are fere to preuile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said he further) ye are first of all to thanke the gods, that haue brought them hither; and then Vs, that haue trained them along, and draue them into necessitie of playing for their liues, where they are fere to loose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when ye met them first: but now ye may euen encourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom ye haue as often beaten as scene. Of one thing only I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as to drue them before you out of Gaul; and to winne the open Countrey, and fields of Italy; both of which ye haue obtained: now are ye to fight for the Townes themselves, and all the riches within them; which this victorie shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, ye shall bee Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this, his brother Mago came to him, whom hee had sent to view the countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to haue with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are a horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them neuer so diligently, thou shalt not finde one man, whose name is Mago. With that hee fell slaughtering, and so did all that stood about him: which gladdened the souldiers, who thought their Generall would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago about many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant only to correct the sad moode of his brother with a jest, and shew himselfe merry vnto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discoverer. But if Hannibal himselfe had bene sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans; he could not haue returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captaine Gaius, before the battail of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henrie the first, saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to bee killed, enow to bee taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Euen such words as these, or such pleasant jests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but serue many times, when battail is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boates.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and vndertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which hee had long before conceived the meanes to draw his enemies to battail; He marshalled his Armie in such convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where euery one might doe best seruice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Sedites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdus; but when we vied our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The grosse of his Armie following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the spoiles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more advantage, than those wherewith they had formerly served; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these hee ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their owne Countreie manner; their shields alike; but the Gaules vsing long broad swordes, that were forcible in a downe-right stroke; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their nauell vpwards, as confident in their owne fiercenesse: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered with purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in qualitie, made a gallant shew; and terrible, because strange. The Gaules were strong of body, and furious in giuing charge; but soone wearied, as accustomed to spend their violence at the first brunt, which disposition all that come of them haue inherited to this day. The Spaniards were lesse eager, but more warie; neither alshamed to giue ground, when they were ouer-pressed, nor afraid to returne, and renew the fight, vpon any small encouragement. As the roughnesse of the one, and patience of the other, served mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firme temper; so the place which they held in this battaile, added confidence joyntly vnto them both. For they saw themselves well and strongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whose name was growne terrible in Spaine, by their Conquests; and in Gaule, by this their present warre. Since therefore it could not bee feared, that any great calamitie should fall vpon them, whilst the wings on either side stood (ast these Barbarians had no cause to shrink, or forbear to imploy the vtmost of their hardines, as knowing that the Enemy could not presse farre vpon them, without further engaging himselfe than discretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horse: by which he was able, if the worst had happened, to make a good retreat. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Desperation begetteth courage; but not greater, nor so liuely, as doth assured Confidence. Hannibal therefore caused these Gaules and Spaniards to aduance, leaving void the place wherein they had stood, and into which they might fall backe, when they should bee over-hardly pressed. So, casting them into the forme of a Crescent; Hee made them as it were his Vantguard: the two points of this great halfe Moone, that looked toward the empty space from which he had drawne it, being narrow and thinne, as serving only to guide it orderly backe, when neede should require; the foremost part of the Ring, swelling out toward the enemies, being well strengthened & thickned against all impression. The circle hereof seemeth to haue bene so great, that it shadowed the Africans, who stood behinde it: though such figures, cut in brasse, as I haue scene of this Battaille, present it more narrow; with little reason, as shall anon appear: as also in the same figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rere, to second the Gaules and Spaniards, when they were driuen to retreat; though it be manifest, that Hannibal in person stood betweene the last ranks of his long battalions, & in the head of his Rere, doubtles well accompanied with the choice of his owne Nation. Betweene the left battalions and the Riuer Aufidus, were the Gaules and Spaniards horse, vnder the command of Asdrubal. On the right wing, toward the wide Plaines, was Hannos (saith Maher) with the Numidian light-horse, Hannibal himselfe, with his brother Mago, had the leading of the Rere. The whole summe of Hannibals Armie in the field this day, was tenne thousand horse, and fourtie thousand foot; his enemies hauing two to one against him in foot; and Hee, fise to three against them in horse.

The Roman Armie was marshalled in the vsual forme: but somewhat more narrow, and deepe, than was accustomed; perhaps, because this had bene found convenient against the Carthaginians, in the former warre. It was indeede no bad way of resistance against Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and short, but the Files long; as also to strengthen well the Rere, that it might stand fast compacted as a wall, vnder shelter whereof the disordered troupes might re-allie themselves. Thus much it seemed, that Terentius had learned of some old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battailles accordingly, as meaning to shew more skill, than was in his vnderstanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their aduantage was in Horfe; against which, this manner of embattailing was very vnprofitable, forasmuch as their charge is better sustained in front, than vpon a long flanke. As for Emilius; it was not his day of command: He was but an Assistant; and in such cases it happens often, that wise men yeeld for very wearinesse vnto the more contentious. Vpon the right hand, and toward the Riuer, were the Roman horse-men, vnder the Consul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro to the 10 other Consul, with the rest of the horse, which were of the Latines, and other Associates: Cn. Seruilius the former yeeres Consul, had the leading of the battaile. The Sunne was newly risen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians hauing their faces Northward; the Romans toward the South.

After some light skirmish, betweene the Roman Velites and Hannibal his Darters and slingers of the Bileares: Asdrubal brake vpon the Consul Paulus, and was roughly encountered; not after the manner of seruice on horse-backe, vsed in those times, wheeling about Alman-like; but each giuing on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as hauing the Riuer on the one hand, and the shoulder of the foot on the other hand; so that there was no way left, but to pierce and breake thorow. Wherefore they not only vsed their Lances and Swords, but rushing violently amongst 20 the Enemies, grasped one another: and so, their horses running from vnder them, fell many to the ground; where starting vp againe, they beganne to deale blowes like foot-men. In conclusion, the Roman horse were ouerborne, and driuen by plaine force to a staggering recoile. This the Consul Paulus could not remedy. For Asdrubal, with his boisterous Gaules and Spaniards, was not to bee resisted by these Roman Gentlemen, vnequall both in number, and in horsemanship. When the battailes came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found worke enough, and somewhat more than enough, to breake that great Crescent, vpon which they first fell: so
 30 strongly, for the while, did the Gaules and Spanish foot make resistance. Wherefore the two points of their battaile drew towards the midst; by whose aide, these Opposites were forced to disband, and flie backe to their first place. This they did in great haste and feare: and were with no lesse haste, and follic pursued. Vpon the Africans, that stood behinde them, they needed not to fall foules; both for that there was void roome enough; and forasmuch as the Reare, or Hornes of this Moone, pointed into the safe retreat, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time should require. In this hasty retreat, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards; it hapned, as was necessarie, that they who had stood in the limbe or vtter compasse of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concave surface thereof
 40 (disordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turne the inside outward: the hornes or points thereof, as yet, vntouched, only turning round, and recoiling very little. So the Romans, in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe-circle; which they should not haue needed greatly to regard, (for that the sides of it were exceeding thinne & broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men rowted, and seeming vnable to make resistance) had all the enemies foot butt 50 cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolved. But whilst the Legions, following their supposed victorie, rushed on vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselves deeply within the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side aduanced so farre, that getting beyond the Reare of them, they inclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without removing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as couered the Africans; who lay behinde it vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled vnawares; and that they behaued themselves, as Hannibal men men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would haue bene so mad, as to runne head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of slaughter; had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines: but since the Consul Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot bee supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselves. Asdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consul Paulus, followed vpon them along the Riuer side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consul himselfe was either driven vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuertheless hee cheered vp his men as well as hee could, both with comfortable wordes, and with the example of his owne stout behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile; and with better successe. For the Consul received a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme; yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakenesse, to forsake his horse. Hereupon all his company alighted, thinking that the Consul had giuen order so to doe: as in many battailes, the Roman men at armes had left their horses, to help their foot in disaies. When Hannibal (for he was neere at hand) perceiued this, and vnderstood that the Consul had willed his horse-men to dismount, He was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather he would haue deliuered them vnto me, bound hand and foot: meaning, that he had them now almost as safe, as if they were so bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horse of the Associates, in the left wing, was maruailously troubled by Hanno (or Mabarbal) and the Numidians: who beating vp and downe about that great sandy Plaine, raised a foule dust; which a strong Southwinde, blowing there accustomarily, draue into the eyes & mouthes of the Romans. These, vsing their aduantage both of number and of lightnesse, wearied the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing, nor sustaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the first they seemed to promise him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were euen ready to ioyne; five hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their shields cast behinde their backs, (as was the manner of those which yielded) and, throwing downe their armes, rendered themselves. This was good lucke to beginne withall, if there had bene good meaning. Varro had not leasure to examine them; but caused them, vnweaponed as they were, to get them behind the Armie, where he bade them rest quietly till all was done. These crafty aduentures did as hee bade them, for a while; till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they had thus yielded. Vnder their Iackets they had short swords and ponyards; besides which, they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were flaine, and therewithall flew vpon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: so that they did great mischief, and raised yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plaine leuell ground, found meanes to lay an ambush at the back of his enemies. The last blow, that ended all fight & resistance, was giuen by the same hand which gaue the first. Asdrubal, hauing in short space broken the Roman troupes of horse, and cut in peeces all, saue the Companie of Æmilus that rushed into the grosse of his foot, and a very few besides, that recovered some narrow passage, betweene the Riuer and their owne Battalions; did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell back behind the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians: with whom hee joyned, and gaue vpon vpon Terentius. This fearefull cloude, as it shewed at the first appearance what weather it had left behinde it, on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismal storme vnto those, vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themselves much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to sustaine; thought it the best way, to auoide the danger by present flight. The Consul was no lesse wise than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his owne perill; nor more desperate, in struiuing to worke impossibilities: it being impossible, when so many shranke from him, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not haue endured with their assistance. Now hee 10 found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to encounter him. But of this; or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his present leisure would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troups, followed the light Numidians: appointed by Asdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fittest for that seruice. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gauls and Spanish horse, compassing about, fell vpon the backes of the Romans; that were ere this hardly distressed, and in a manner surrounded on all parts else. He brake them casily; who before made ill resistance, being inclosed, & laid at on euery side, not knowing which way to turne. Here beganne a pittifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and 20 downe, they knew not whither or which way, whilst euery one sought to auoide those enemies, whom hee saw neere. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Emilius, got vp to horse, and saued themselves: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could doe; yet I will rather beleue it, than suppose that Liaie so reporteth, to grace thereby his Historie with this following tale. C. N. CORNELIUS LENTULVS, galloping along by a place, where he saw the Consul sitting all bloodied vpon a stone, entreated him to rise and saue himselfe; offering him his assistance and horse. But PAVLVS refused it; willing LENTVLVS to shift for himselfe, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to be brought againe into iudgement by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guiltie himselfe of that dayes losse. Further hee willed 30 LENTVLVS to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to FABIUS: willing them to fortifie Rome, as fast and well as they could; and telling FABIUS, that hee liued and died mindfull of his whole some counsaile. These words (peradventure) for some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when against his will hee was drawne to that Battaille, or when hee beheld the first defeat of his Horse; at what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what hee said a good while before this; when he thought the Consul and his troupe, in little better case than if they had bene bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, was inclosed indeede as within a lacke; whereof the African Battalions made the sides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottom; and Asdrubal with his horse, closed vp the mouth: in which part, they first 40 of all were shuffled together, and beganne the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Emilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilst the battaille yet lasted, and whilst the spaces were somewhat open, by which hee might haue withdrawne himselfe; was now (had hee neuer so well bene mounted) vnabie to flie, hauing in his way so close a throng of his owne miserable followers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It sufficeth vnto his honour, That in the Battaille hee fought no lesse valiantly, than hee had warily before, both abstained himselfe, and dissuaded his fellow-Consul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was vtterly lost, it had laine in his power to saue his owne life, vnto the good of his Countrie, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that he either too much disesteemed himselfe; or being too faintly minded, was wearie of the World, and his vnthankfull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Emilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the English vertue of the Lord John Talbot Vicount Lille, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsburie, who died in the Battaille of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Emilius was old, grieuouly, if it not mortally wounded, and accountable for the overthrow received: Talbot was in the flower of his youth, vnbur, eaily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refused to forsake his father, who foreseeing the losse of the battaile, and not meaning to flaine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone, and leaue him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, saue two or three thousand, who (as Liue saith) escaped into the lesser campe; whence, the same night, about fixe hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselves away ere morning, about foure thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troups, partly disperſed, into Cannuſum: the next day, the Roman Camps, both lesse and greater, were yeelded vnto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Emilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-nere done, the battaile was lost: and Hannibal, comming over the water to them, draue them into their owne campe; which they quickly yeelded, hauing lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first fight of Hannibal, comming vpon them with his victorious Armie, a great number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, retired into their campe, and held the Enemy busied. For about ten Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that hauing serued at Canna, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their Companions fighting. Of the Roman horſe what numbers escaped, it is vncertaine: but very few they were that saued themselves in the first charge, by getting behinde the Riuer; and Terentius the Consul recovered Venusia, with threecore and ten at the most in his companie. That he was so ill attended, it is no maruaile: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neereſt way thither, had bene through the midſt of Hannibal's Armie, if the passage had bene open. Therefore it muſt needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned vp ſome by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contr'e. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but took: other waies, and were ſcattered ouer the fields; two thousand, or thereabouts, were gathered vp by the Numidians, & made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all saue three hundred; who disperſed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into sundry Townes. There died in this great Battaille of Canna, besides L. Emilius Paulus the Consul; two of the Roman Quaestors or Treasurers, and one and twentie Colonells or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourscore Senators, or such as had borne Office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of especiall make, as hauing bene Ædiles, Prætors, or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Seruilius the last yeeres Consul, and Minutius, late Master of the horſe. The number of prisoners, taken in this battaile, Liue makes no greater than three thousand foot, and three hundred horse: too few to haue defended, for the space of one halfe houre, both the Roman camps; which yet the same Liue saith, to haue bene our-cowardly yeelded vp. We may therefore doe better, to giue credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no lesse than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemy spared, when the furie of Execution was past: but to these muſt be added about ſixe thousand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their companie were either slaine or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before caſt vp (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died ſome foure thousand Gauls, fifteene hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse, or thereabouts: a losse not ſensible, in the joy of ſo great a victorie; which if he had purſued, as Maharbal aduiſed him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome; it is little doubted, but that the Warre had presently bene at an end. But he beleeued not ſo farre in his owne proſperitie; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to loſe, a victorie.

Of things following the battaile at Canna.

Without good cauſe doth Polybius reprehend thoſe two Hiſtorians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleaſure of them, vnto whose honour they conſecrated their trauailes, than the truth of things, & information of poſteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quæſtors and Fathers conſcript. No man of found iudgement will condemne this libertie of cenſure, which Polybius hath vſed. For, to recompence his iunioritie, (ſuch as it was) he produceth ſo ſubſtantiall arguments, to iuſtifie his owne Relation; and conſuteſt the vantage of thoſe former Authors, out of their owne writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which paines it is to be ſuſpected, that he would not haue taken, had he bene borne in either of theſe two Cities, but haue ſpared ſome part of his diligence, and bene contented, to haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deſerued, of his owne Countrey. The like diſeaſe it is to be feared, that we ſhall hereafter finde in others; and ſhall haue cauſe to wiſh, that either they were ſome what leſſe Roman, or elſe, that ſome Works of their oppoſite Writers were extant, that ſo we might at leaſt heare both ſides ſpeake: being henceforth deſtitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent. But ſince this cannot be, we muſt be ſometimes bold, to obſerue the coherence of things; and beleue ſo much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reaſon, or (at leaſt) faire probability. This attentive circumſpection is needfull euen at the preſent: ſuch is the repugnance, or forgetfulneſſe, which we finde in the beſt Narration, of things following the Battaille of Canna. For it is ſaid, that foure thousand foot and horſe gathered together about the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others, to the number of ten thousand got into Cannuſum, chooſing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Consul Terentius Varro, joyning his companie vnto thoſe of Scipio at Cannuſum, wrote vnto the Senate, that he had now well-nere ten thousand men about him; that theſe letters of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly riſen, that had bene taking order for pacifying thoſe tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon the firſt bruit of the overthrow; and yet, that Embaſſadours from Canna (after ſome conſultation, whether it were meet to ſend any, or, without further circumſtance, to ſide with Hannibal) were ſent vnto Terentius, and found him at Venusia, a pretie while before he wrote thoſe letters, which ouer-tooke (in a manner) at Rome the firſt newes of the overthrow. Among ſuch incoherences, I hold it the beſt way, to omit ſo much as hath not ſome particular connexion with matter enſuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no ſmall argument of truth.

When Hannibal had ſacked the Roman campe, and truſſed vp the ſpoiles, forthwith he diſlodged, and marched away into Sammum; finding a diſpoſition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forſake the Roman partie, and make alliance with Carthage. The firſt Towne that opened the gates vnto him, was Coffa, where he laid vp his baggage: and leauing his brother Mago to take in other places, He haſted into Campania. The generall affection of the Multitude, in all the Cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not only in regard of their grieuous losses, sustained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themselves, who could not hinder him from spoiling the Countrey, especially the poorer sort of them, did hardly endure; but in a louing respect vnto that great courtesie (as it seemed) which he vied, vnto such of them as became his prisoners. For as at other times, so now also after his great victorie at Cannæ, He had louingly dismissed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being so oblitrate, against him that had fought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither spared hee to winne their loue with gifts; pretending, to admire their valour; but seeking in deede, by all waies and means, to make them his, whilst all other motives were concurrent. At this time also hee beganne to deale kindly (though against his nature) with his Roman prisoners: telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Estate; but being prouoked by iniuries, fought to right himselfe and his countrey; and fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, should beare soueraigne Rule, not, which of them should be destroyed. So he gaue them leaue to chosse ten of their number, that should be sent home to treat with the Fathers about their ranfome: and together with these, he sent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horse, to seeke the disposition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by so much aduersitie, and could stoop vnto desire of peace. But with the Romans these artes preuailed not, as shall be shewed in due place. The people of Italie, all or most of them, saue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their losses past, but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not vntill the former generation vtterly subdued, beganne to re-assume their wonted spirits: but the Campanians, a Nation of all other in Italie most bound vnto the state of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as slightly conioyned, as were any saue the Latines, changed on a sudden their loue into hatred; without any other cause found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the most goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not (as some then thought) of all the Earth: and the Citie of Capua, answerable vnto the Countrey, whercofit was Head, so great, faire, and wealthie, that it seemed no lesse conuenient a seat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauerie is the least requisite vnto soueraigne command. The Campanians were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themselves like layes by their feathers, despised the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there some of the principall among them, as in other Cities, that bore especiall regard vnto the maiestie of Rome, and could not endure to heare of Innouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately so preuailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleasure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calenus an ambitious Noble-man, whose credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering all popular desires: wherof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the least. Some of the Capuans had offered their Citie to the Carthaginian, shortly after the battaile of Thrasymene: wherupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iourne into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the nerenes of the Roman Armie, or some other feare of the Capuans, hindered them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leisure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leisure serued, yet were the Multitude (whose inconstant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vñage, and free dismissing, of some prisoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any such negotiation, without aduice of the Senate; which mainly impugned it. So they that had promised to yeeld vp their town to Hannibal, &c. to meet him on the way, with some of their nobility, that should assure him of all faithfull meaning, were driuen to sit still, in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet sufficiently discovered themselves, felues, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this case were no small number of the Citizens: who thereupon grew the more incensed against their Senate; on whom they cast all the blame, easily pardoning their owne cowardize. The People holding so tender a regard of libertie, that euen the lawfull Gouerment of Magistrates grieued them, with an imaginarie opprellion; had now good cause to feare lest the Senators would become their Lords indeed, and by helpe of the Romans, bring them vnder a more freight subiection, than euer they had endured. This feare, being readie to breake into some outrage, Pacuvius made vse of, to serue his owne ambition. He discoursed vnto the Senate, as they sate in Councell; about these motions troubling the Citie: and said, That he himselfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and giuen his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forsaking the Roman partie was not now the greatest: for that the People were violently bent euen to murder all the Senate, and afterward to joyn themselves with Hannibal; who should countenance the fact, and saue them harmlesse. This he spake, as a man well known to be beloued himselfe by the People, and proue vnto their desires. Hauing thoroughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He promised neuertheless to deliuer them all, and to set things in quiet, if they would freely put themselves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other assurance that they should demand, for their faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then shutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor issue forth, without his leaue; He called the People to assembly: and speaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to heare, he told them, that these wicked Gouerours were surprisid by his policie, and all fast, readie to abide what sentence they would lay vpon them. Only thus much he aduised them, as a thing which necessitie required, That they should chosse a new Senate, before they satisfied their anger vpon the old. So rehearsing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, hee asked what their iudgement was of those. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Chosse then (said he) first of all some new ones into their places. Hereat the Multitude, vnprovided for such an election, was silent; vntill at last, some one or other aduentioned to name whom he thought fit. The men so nominated, were vtterly disliked by the whole Assembly; either for some knowne fault, baseness, and insufficiencie; or else euen because they were vnknowne, and therefore helde vnworthie. This difficultie in the new Election appearing more and more, whilst more were to be chosen; (the fittest men to be substituted, hauing bene named among the first, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius entreated, and easily preuailed with the people, that the present Senate might for this time be spared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doublelesse) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences past. Henceforth, not only the People, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and esteemed him their Patron; but the Senators also were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themselves indebted, for sauing all their liues. Neither did the Senate faile after this, by all obsequiousnesse, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawlesse Will, who else were likely to cast them downe: All the Citie being thus of one minde; only feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaille at Cannæ, this impediment was removed: and few there were, that would open their mouthes to speake against the Rebellion. Yet forasmuch as three hundred principall Gentlemen of the Campanians, did then serue the Romans in the Isle of Sicily: the Parents and Kinsmen of these preuailed so farre, that Embassadors were sent vnto Terentius the Consul; to see his present case, and what it could minister of Hope or Feare. These, wheresoeuer they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in spirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the seruice of their State; and desired to know what he would command them. But he most basely lamented vnto them the greatnesse of the Roman misfortune: saying, that all was lost, and that the Campanians must now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themselves, but make warre in their defence against the Carthaginians; as the Romans had sometimes done for the Campanians against the Samnites. Hereunto hee is said to have added a foolish Inuention, against Hannibal & his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of slaughtered carcases, and to feede vpon mans flesh; with such other stuffe, as onely bewaied his owne feare. As for the Campanians themselves, He put them in minde of their present strength: they hauing thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; with monie, and all prouisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder then they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in aduenturing to seeke their owne libertie. Hauing reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made Alliance, vpon these conditions; That no Citizen of theirs should be subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistracie, in what case soeuer, whether in Warre or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campanians three hundred Roman prisoners, such as they themselves would chooſe, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicily.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius an honourable Citizen opposed himselfe earnestly: vying, in vaine, many persuasions, to the willfull and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wishing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors to Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded, but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entering the Towne: at which time he gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it and to cut it in pieces, that, by such a notable piece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was giuen to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleging that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon halsted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well provided, to lay siege vnto it. At Capua hee was entertained with great solemnitie and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the Towne, to behold that great Commander, which had wonne so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainements; He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italie, and Rome it selfe, should bee drinen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and recieue Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly tooke part with the Romans their enemies; Hee prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campanian, but a Traitor to the State; and vſe him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserved. This was granted: and Magius deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if he kept him aliue, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal settled his friendship with the Campanians; among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assailed by Perolla the sonne of Pacuvius. This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal, whilest hee was at supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authoritie kept him from making any such attempt. All the Towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other Townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nucerina, Naples, Casertine, and Acerria, were the Citie next adioyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to finde them weakly manned, as they were indeede, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Townes; but were faine to leaue all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreme feare of Hannibals comming, at the first report of the ouerthrow at Cannae; and the griefe of that losse was so general, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the prouision against apparent danger. It was hard to iudge, whether the losse already receiued, or the feare of destruction presently threatening, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to stint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Courriers were sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when letters from the Consul Varro had thoroughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ranne into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal bookes, buried aliue two men and women Gauls and Greekes, in their Oxe-market. If the bookes of Sibyl gaue them such instructions; we may iustly thinke, that Sibyl her selfe was instructed by the Deuill. Yet it is not improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to harken to wicked Sooth-sayers; whose detestable counsailes they afterwards, for their owne honour, (as alſamed of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embassadour was sent to Delphi, to consult the Oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods, and obtaine an end of these calamities. This is enough to discouer the greatnesse of their feare; though not seruing to giue remedie. At the same time came letters out of Sicily, from the Prætor Othacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to passe ouer into Africa. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian fleet, that waited the Kingdome of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Iles Agateis, which was in readinesse to set vpon Lilybeum, and the rest of the Roman Prouince, if the Prætor stirred aliue to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take soueraigne charge of the Weale publike, with absolute power, as necessitie required. It must needs seeme strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, & bid him welcome home, giuing him thanks for that he had not depaied of the Weale publike. But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doublelesse) prouided wisely, for vpholding the generall reputation. If his comming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations and out-cries of the people: what else would haue followed, than a contempt of their wretchednesse, among those that were subiect vnto their Dominion? Now in finishing this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome, and thanks; they noyed abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal; of their Magnanimitie and Confidence: that might seeme grounded on their remayning strength. This therefore was wisely done: But whereas Liaue would haue vs thinke, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleue him not. It was done fearefully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would haue struck off his head; as in few yeeres after, Cn. Fulsius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Iunius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to multering of Souldiers, of whom they raised foure new Legions, and a thousand horse: though with much difficultie; as being faine to take vp some, that were very Boies. These foure Legions, are elsewhere forgotten, in account of the forces leuiued by this Dictator; and two Legions only set downe, that had bene enrolled in the beginning of the yeere for custodie of the Citie. Wherefore it may be, that these two Legions being drawne into the field, foure new ones of Protestati, or Strippings, were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them eight thousand furdie slaues, that were put in hope of libertie, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This not sufficing; The Dictator proclaimed, that whosoever ought money and could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith bee discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the Warre. To arme these Companies, they were faine to take downe, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bene there set vp: among which, were sixe thousand Armour of the Gauls, that had bene carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this Warre. To such mockerie had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions; that they were faine to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthago, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Canna, came to Rome. Carthago was not admitted into the Citie, but commanded, whilest he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territorie. To the messengers of the captiues, audience was given by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the publike charge; not only the reares and lamentation of their poore kins-folke, but the great neede, wherein the Citie then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their fate; which yet they obtained not. Besides the generall custome of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and strengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken prisoner in the former warre) not to bee too tender of such as had yielded to the Enemy; much was alleaged against these who now craued ransome: but the special point was, that they were wilfully lost, since they might haue saved themselves, as others did. It sufficed not vnto these poore men, to say, that their offence was no greater than the Consuls: they were told, that this was great presumption. The truth was, the State wanted money: and therefore could not want excuses, whereby to auoid the disbursement: whether it were so, or not, that any such Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as wee find recorded. Neyther must wee regard it, that the slaues which were armed for the warre, are said to haue cost more, than the summe did amount vnto, that would haue ransomed these prisoners. For this is but a tale, deuised to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had bene seuerer; when as indeed they were fureable to the present fortune, poore, and some what beggerly. Hereof it is no little prooffe, That Hannibal valued those Roman slaues, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Masters, at no more, than euery one the third part of a common Souldiers ransome: and likely it is, that hee offered them at the price, whereat hee thought them current. But wee should suppose, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for slaues might haue been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with priuate men; yet must we withall consider, that these priuate men did only lend these slaues for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forebear the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchised) vntill the warre should be ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen such long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would haue bene his chapmen: but seeing he dealt only for ready monie, they chose rather to say, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like austeritie, vpon the same reason, but contrarie pretence, was vsd toward the Souldiers that escaped from that great Battaille. These were charged for hauing fled; as the prisoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done so. True it is, that in such cases (if euery that which they call ragione del Stato may serue for an excuse: when the Common-wealth being driuen to a miserable Exigent, is faine to helpe it selfe, by doing injuries to priuate priuate men. And so dealt the Romans now: condemning all those that had serued at Canna, to be transported into Sicily; and there to serue, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twentie yeeres in the warres, or else were fiftie yeeres of age; but vntill this warre should be ended, how long fouer it lasted, and that without reward. The same thriftie censure, was afterwards laid vpon others, for their misbehaviour: but neuer vpon any man of qualitie, saue only (a good while after this, at better leisure) vpon Cacilius Metellus, and a few other bare-brained fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wits, with the terror of so great a losse, were deuiling, after the battaille, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal was yet had scarce one Towne within it. The inequalitye of this rigour grew shortly distastfull to the Commonalitie: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the People, neuer. Lind. 125. thelesse it was quietly digested, the excuse being no lesse apparent than the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing dispatched all needfull businesse within the Citie,ooke the field with sixe and twentie thousand men. What he did with this Arme, I cannot finde: nor more of him, than this, That he spent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was notidle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weakc citate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prators, lay at Ofilia with a fleet, ready to set saile for Sicily, hauing one Legion aboard his ships, & fiftie hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces he was to defend that liand, and doe what harme hee could in Africa. But hearing of the ouerthrow at Canna, he sent these of his new Leuie to Rome, for defence of the Citie; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Cannusium: deliuering the fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates, & chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were like to be forced by the Multitude (as these were the rest of the Campans) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to auoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the Articles of this new Confederacie. Wherefore he made great iournies thitherward; and arrived euen time enough to preuent the Enemy. Many idle walks Hannibal made, betwixt Nola and Naples: allaying by faire words, and terrible threats, the one and the other Citie. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyaltie: it had also a sure Hauens, whereby it stood in the lesse feare, of fustaying much inconuenience, by spoile of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poore people were vtterly vndone. So thought the Multitude: and such talke vsed some, that had little feare of their owne priuate want or poeuerie, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Banius was chiefe; a stout yong Gentleman, and Souldier of especial marke, well beloued in the Citie, and one that had done good seruice to the Romans: but was found by Hannibal, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle vsage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberall gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to returne the greatest thanks he could vnto so courteous an Enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought vpon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had bene by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well serued of the Roman state, had not repaired vnto him the Prator, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and louing entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly reputed for his personal valour, he made this Banius so far in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently aduertisement. As for the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal remoued from about Nola; and assailed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptorie answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Auerria: which he tooke by composition; and so returned back againe again to Nola. Hee was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him : who although they durst not stirre in his quarrell, being out-10 awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly besieged, and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not bee wanting vnto the accomplishment of their owne desires. Hee therefore brought his Armie close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus : not in hope thereby to doe much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne; which hee sought in the meane while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed mes-15 sages betweene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if Marcellus, with all his forces, could bee trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise; and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised: and fearing, lest the Conspiratois would shortly adventure, euen to finde him busied within the Citie, while 20 the Carthaginians should scale the walls; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three Companies, within three severall gates looking towards the Enemy: He gaue a straight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus hee lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom hee cus-25 tomarily issued forth before more early, euery day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them; then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discovered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Whereupon hee bade his men bring ladders, and make ready for the as-30 sault; which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing lesse; than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, wherat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected fallie the more terrible. Whilest the Carthaginians, much out of order, were 35 some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, wherat in like sort issued they of the new-leued Companies, vpon the enemies backs. The sudden terrour was more available vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victorie, and reputed one of the brauest Acts performed in all that warre; for as much as hereby it was first proued, that Hannibal might be ouer-come. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict account 40 of the Citizens of Nola: condemning about threecore and ten of high Treason, whose heads hee struck off; and so leauing the Towne in quiet obedience vnto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Suessula. Hannibal in the meane season was gone to Aceris: where being excluded, he thought it no wisdome to loose time in perswasions, but laid siege vnto it, and beganne on all sides to close it vp. This ter-45 rified the People, who knew themselves vnable to hold out. Therefore, before his Workes were finished, and they quite surrounded, they stole out by night, and left him the Towne emptie: which hee sacked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that hee was about Casiline, thither went Hannibal: as being vnwilling, that an Enemy so neere should disquiet him at Capua; where hee meant to Winter. It seemes, or rather indeede it is plaine, that the late victorie of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: who durst with a small part of his Armie seeke 50 out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman strength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, at the most, and those not slaine in plaine battaile, but by a sudden crupcion; witnesseth chiefly, in what great feare they stood of Hannibal, and how Crest-fallen they were: that hauing three yeeres since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hannibal, to be deliuered vnto their pleasure, by his owne Citizens; could now please themselves, as with good newes, to heare, That in a skirmish not farre from

from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not resolutelesse. At Caslinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the towne, and held it. Five hundred of the Præsentines there were, and about foure hundred of Perusia, with some of the Lates. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the Battaille of Canna, being sent by their severall States to the campe:
 10 whither whilest they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and sent them backe sorrowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder whose gouernement they liued happily. So came they all, one after another, to Casiline, where they met and staid. Neither had they staid there long, ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the Ring-leader of 15 all the Campani into rebellion. The people of Casiline were affected as they of Ca-pua: and therefore fought how to rid their hands of those Præsentines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laid one for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a night, and fortified the We-20 sterne part of the Towne (for it was diuided by the Riuer Vulturnus) against the Enemie. If they had runne away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casiline were as the rest of the Campani, all Traitors; they themselves might haue been reputed, as no better than the Atuerines. But their constancie in defence of the place witnesseth, vpon what honest reasons they perswaded. Hannibal came thither, 25 thinking to haue encountered with greater forces: but these few found him more worke than he expected. Diuers assaults hee gaue, but was still repelled with losse; and many fallies they made, with variable euent. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: opposing so much indutic to his force, that hee was driuen to close them vp, and seeke to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Ma-30 ster of the horse, lay with the Roman Armie higher vp the Riuer: who saue would haue relieued Casiline, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had giuen him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Suessula could not come: his way being stopp'd by the ouer-flowsings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leaue them, who were in danger of 35 the Campani, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water staied his iourne, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like, that the Dictator tarried at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Casiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Towne was lost, because the Romans durst not adventure to raise the siege. Barrells of corne were sent by night, floating downe the Riuer; 40 and when some of these, being carried awry by an Eddie of the water, stuck among the Willowes on the banks, whereby this manner of reliefe was discovered and preuented; Gracchus cast a great quantitie of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustained the poore besieged men. At length, when all foode was spent, and whatsoeuer grew greene vnder the walls was gathered for fallies; the Carthaginians 45 ploughed vp the ground: whereon the besieged presently found Rape-seeds. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and said, That hee meant not to stay at Ca-siline, vntill the Rapes were growne. Wherefore, though hitherto hee had refused to hearken vnto any Compulsion, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacie; yet now hee was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent ranfome, which when they had paid, hee quietly dismis-50 sed them according to his promise. Seven hundred Carthaginians hee placed in Casiline, as a Garrison for defence of the Campani; vnto whom hee restored it. To the Præ-sentine Souldiers great thanks were giuen, and doeing rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in 55 Præsentis; which is no weak proofe, of the good estate wherein the Citie flourished; that were subject to the Roman Gouernement. This siege of Casiline was not a little beneficiall to the Romans; as hauing long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might other wise haue bene better spent. For Winter ouer-tooke him;

him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honor he knew not, when hee was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Armie, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, and made it effeminate; though, effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

2. X.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to HANNIBAL in Italie. 10
How by the malice of HANNO, and steele parsimonie of the Carthaginians, the supply was so long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. OF FABIVS and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

When Mago, the sonne of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canna; his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, and thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull message of Victorie. 20
He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Roman Generalls his brother had fought; what Consuls he had chased, wounded, or slaine; how the stout Romans, that in the former war neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Capitaine, because he neuer durst adventure to come to battaile; that, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them about two hundred thousand, and taken above fiftie thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Bruttians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italie, that following the fortune of those great victories, had revolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly Citie, and fit to be not only (as already it was) 30
Head of all the Capuans, but the chiefe seat of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had bene entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warre, He said it was cūen at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselves, and repaire their broken forces. Hee willed them to consider, that the warre was farre from home, in the Enemies Countre; that so many Battailles had much diminished his brothers Armie; that the Souldiers, who had so well deserved, ought to be considered with liberrall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of monie, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must bee sent from Carthage: 40 which the victorie would requite with large amends. Finally hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slaine, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bulshels, or as others would rather haue it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamitie, forasmuch as none but the " principall of that Order, were accustomed to wear that ornament.

* Thus Liue reports it: and credible it is, that while Rome was poore, the bragging of priuateness was not altogether so great, as the Law would haue permitted; though otherwise I am assured, it be the wearing of the Ring, was the generally privileged of the Roman Equites.

Whoso considers the former Punicke Warre, may easily find, that the State of Carthage neuer did receiue, in all the durance thereof, any such hopefull aduertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no meruaile, if the Errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemencie of this joy, Dimilio, a Senator 50 aduerte to the fiction of Hanno, is said to haue demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome. Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yielded vp vnto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks vnto the gods, for this their good success. Hereunto though it bee not likely that

Hanno made the same formall answer, which Liue puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull ouerthrow receiued at the Islands Agates: yet the summe of his speech appeares to haue bene no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchinies, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported; saying, It ill befecmed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had bene beaten; or him, that had taken their campe, filled forsooth with spoile, to make request for meat and monie. To these caulls, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other bootie than of horses and slaues; little was to be found in the Roman campe: the belt of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few siluer studs in the bridles and trappings of a Libian 10 their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine conuoy of mony and prouisions, going to supply all wants of a great Armie in some other Prouince, (as the two Scipios are afterwards said to haue done, when they wanne the campe of Asdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his iourne towards Italie) then might such an objection more iustly haue bene made vnto his demand of a supply. 20
But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein hee best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswasion to vse their fortune with moderation; and now to seeke peace, whilst they had so much the better in warre.

What would haue bene the issue of this counsaile, if it had bene followed, it were not easie to say. For though it bee likely, that the Roman pride would haue brooked much indignitie, in freeing Italie from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely, that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue bene kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for reuenge of so many shamefull ouerthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submissive behauiour could preserue Carthage from ruine, longer 30 than vntill such time, as Rome was at leisure from all other warres. This counsaile therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was indeede very pestilent; and serued only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that fortie thousand Numidian, fortie Elephants, and great abundance of siluer, should bee sent ouer to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twentie thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, should be leued in Spain; not only to supply, as neede should require, the Armies in that Prouince, but to be transported into Italie.

This great aide, had it bene as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not haue found cause, to taxe the rebellious improuidence of 40
Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Canneto to Rome, or in refreshing his Armie among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would haue finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous adventure; and the pleasures, which his men enioyed among the Campanians, would haue bene commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to bee employed in the following warre. But either the too much carelesnesse of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their monie, before extreme necessitie required it; or the craftie malice of Hanno, and his followers, working vpon the priuate humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commoditie; than sense of the publike neede; vtterly peruerter, and made vnprofitable in the performance, the 50 order that had bene so well set downe. The Elephants were sent: and some Libians monie peradventure; vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of three score thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italie, till much was lost of that which already had bene gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Armie, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of warre. Only some some small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaines; and the iourne of Adrabat thence through France into Italie much talked of; but he not enabled thereto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Heere wee may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by the Tributes received from their subiects, and by their wealthy Trade of merchandize. For it is not long, since the warre of the Mercinaries; and the perfidious tyrannie of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelue hundred talents; had exceedingly impoueriſhed Carthage: which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of so much monie, as was to bee disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the losse of Agathis. Yet wee see, what great Armies of Nu- midians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the seruice in Italie, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of mony in these chargeable vndertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, hauing three or foure yeeres together bene forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasurie, had the wealthy merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, euen from Tyrrus their Mother-City in the bottome of the fireights vnto the great Ocean, about the Romans: who liued on the fruits of their ground; and receiued their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage, the impudence of Roman fallshood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discovered plainly whence the ialousie was bred, that this mighty Citie would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, hauing giuen vp hostages, euen before the Roman Armie did set forth, to performe whatsoeuer should bee enjoyned them, with condition that their Citie might not bee destroyed; and hauing accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded vp all their weapons, and engines of warre; the Romans told them plainly, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the Bodie of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Towne must needs be demolished, and remoued into some other place, that should be twelue miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of merchandize, by which ye now liue, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of husbandrie; an whole some kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conseruation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glossing words, plainly shewes, what good obseruation the elder Cato had made of the halte growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, added fill this conclusion, Thus I thinke; and that Carthage should be destroyed; Hee may seeme, not only to haue had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the Citie, but much more vnto these times, & the great height whereto it rose, euen suddenly as wee see, out of many calamities, whilst the Romans thought, that it had not bene in case to dare so terrible a warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publicke good: hauing every one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne priuate benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection, wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly, was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had bene requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade couetous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Armie into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the Enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who hauing once (if they could so doe) finished the warre, might easily make * Hanniball a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that he had giuen them to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne slacknesse, incredulitie, dulnesse, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make small disturbances in Spain, than to set vp all their reit at once in Italie. Yet was it indeed impossible, to hold a Countrey of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of Spain, free from all incursion of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturalles being (as in a new Conquest) still established. A better way therefore it had bene to make a running warre, by which the Romans might haue bene found occupied, euen with the ordinarie Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to deferre the prosecution of their maine intendment against Rome it selfe, vntill such time as euery little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Province, then must Emporia haue bin besieged & forced: which by reason of alliance with the Masilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a readie and secure Harbour. But the Towne of Emporia was too strong to be wonne in halfe: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians; hauing not about foure hundred paces of wall to the maine Land, and exceedingly well fortified; a great Spanish Towne of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Gracians, though not ouer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this Towne of Emporia, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Masilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would haue bene a worke of little lesse difficultie, than was the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Canna: yea it had bin in effect none other, than to alter the seat of the warre, which Hanniball had already fixed, with better iudgement, neere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficultie of this attempt being such as caused it altogether to be forborne; great follie it was, to bee much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawne home to their owne doores, by making strong warre vpon their Citie. For euen so the Romans afterwards remoued Hanniball into Africk, by sending an Armie to Carthage; & by taking the like course, they now endeouored to change the seat of the warre, transferring it out of Italie into Spain. But the priuate affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is necessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that somewhat would fall out well of it selfe, though they set not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were wel enough contented to harken vnto his discourses, as long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane while they suffered Hanniball, and all the noble house of Amilcar, to wearie themselves in triuall for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly assisted; as if the indolence of these Barchinies had been somewhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were farre lesse honourable than the people of Rome: not only in gouernement of their subiect Provinces, but in administration of their owne Estate; few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike about their priuate interest. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parsimonie vsed toward their own Mercinaries, when the former Roman warre was finished: so the conclusion of this warre present, will make them complain, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hanniball, after the victorie at Canna; when gladly they would giue all their Treasures, to redeeme the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it were cost enough to send a few handfulls into Spain.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the state of Africk it selfe, depended wholly,

* Of such ambition Hanno directly accused Hanniball, saying that he made warre that so he might liue compelled with Legions, not knowing no other way to make himselfe a King. Liv. lib. vi.

ly, or for the most part, vpon successe of things in Italie; the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters were ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouvernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprehend in that worthy Historian Liue, the tender loue of his owne Country, which made him giue credit vnto Fabius and others; yet must we not, for his sake, beleue those lies, which the vnpartial iudgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the vntruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former warre, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being cū broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselues vnto the Romans. Contrarie herunto we finde in the life of Amilcar, let downe by Emilius Probus, That Eryx was in such fort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not bene any warre. These wordes, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian Souldiers, and the singular vertue of their General infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouerliberall. For in the treatie of peace betwene Amilcar and Catalus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes, and forsake Stail, threatening, that otherwise he would not talke of any composition: Amilcar boldly bade him choofe, whether he would talke of it, or no; for that the Armes, which his Countrey had put into his hands to vse against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to yeeld vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrarie to their custome vpon like aduantages, were content to let Amilcar haue his will, and not to stand with him vpon point of honour, whilst otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough it is, that they were farre from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with vntruth; saying, that howsoeuer Amilcar, and his Souldiers, had endured all extremities, yet they behaued themselves as men that had no sence thereof; and were as farre from being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference betwene Fabius (as also perhaps betwene other old Writers of the Roman storie) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mightie Citie of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoeuer Liue introduceth Hanno, in one place, ioyning very foolishly his owne shamefull ouerthrow at the Ilands, * Egeates, with the great seruices of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet elsewhere he forbearth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his owne vnhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their fleet in that battaile at Sea: wherein himselfe was General. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio in Spaine, there is cause to wile, that this Fabius, with Val. Antius, and others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Liue to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations: which are such as follow.

* Egeates Insulas, ex quibus ante oculis preponitur, &c. Liue lib. 33. a Liue lib. 23.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italie.

It hath bene shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Gaul into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Armie, into Spaine. Two Roman Legions, with foure- teene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horse, had bene allotted vnto this Consul, therewith to make warre in Spaine against Hannibal: who since he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Armie, P. Scipio beleueed, that a good part of these his owne forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carrie some of the number backe with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remainy in Italie all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a fleet of thirtie Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and as they are reported, somewhat maruailous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, & with-drew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we haue cause to wonder, how the Enemye could so often finde meanes to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Countrey from the tyrannie of Carthage, might easily winne vnto their Confederacie, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerours might serue to arme the Naturalls against these Inuaders; and to reclaime those, that had resolted vnto the Romans, were it onely by the memorie of such ill successe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian treasure: which easily raised souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirstie Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian warres; or seruing the Carthaginians in Africk. And peraduenture, if we durst be bold to say it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great, as they are set out by Liue. This we may be bold to say, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Liue in his person, maketh an obiection vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Liue for him, doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spaine: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had bene extremely dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should inuade Italie. And it is indeede an incredible narration, That Asdrubal being closed in on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of a battaile, saue onely by the steep descent of Rocks, ouer a broken Riuer that lay at his backe, ranne away with all his monie, Elephants, and broken troupes, ouer Tages, directly towards the Pyrencees, and so toward Italie; vpon which he fell with more than threefore thousand armed Souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs wel together, That he chose a peece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retreat, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his monie and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemye: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so are they said to haue done in the last battaile betwene him and Scipio) from breaking into his camp. Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this warre, and Spanish (if there were any) being vtterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no seldome to giue too much credit. In this regard, I will summarily runne ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine; not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporia, an Haven-towne, not farre within the Pyrenees, retaining still the same name with little inflexion. That by the fame of his clemencie he allured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie beginnes of him, I could easily beleue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vse his clemencie, or he to giue such famous example thereof, being a mere stranger, and hauing no iurisdiction in the Countrey. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man verie courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexteritie in practice had the better successe, for that he seemed to haue none other errand, than setting them at libertie. This pretext auailed with some: others were to be hired with monie: and some hee compelled to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when he had wonne a battaile against Hanno. In to all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that he remembered to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Aluestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conferunt, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Maieitie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implied it indeed an obscure couenant of subiection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became dittons Romanes of the Roman iurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Countrey wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italie; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Barguntians; Hannibal had found, at his coming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governour ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Prouince betwene Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not thinke he gaue the Principalltie of their Countrey vnto Hanno and his Heires,) He made him not only Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but rooke from them all inferior Officers of their owne, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the coming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of al conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times proue worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanais, in the age of our Grand-fathers, wearie by turnes of the Spaniards and Frenches; as more sensible still of the present euil which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ranne by seeking to auoid it. This bad affection of his Prouince, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Prouince. Therefore he aduentured a battaile with Scipio; wherein he was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victorie, Scipio besieged Stiffum, a Towne hard by, and wanne it. But Asdrubal hauing passed Iberus, and coming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot and a thousand horse, fel vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found carelesse, as after a victorie, rousing abroad in the Countrey; and with great slaughter draue them aboard their ships. This done, he ranne vp into the Countrey, where he with-drew the Illyrgetes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane season was gone to visit and aide his fleet: where hauing fet things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but with-drew himselfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Illyrgetes were compelled by force, hauing lost Athanagia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their hostages. The Aulstani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirte

dayes; hoping in vaine, that the sharpe Winter, and great abundance of snow that fell, would haue made the Romans to dislodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their oblinacie, they were amerced twentie Talents of siluer. During the siege, the Lactani came to helpe their distressed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thousand of their Companie dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how these Lactani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should without any cause remembered, become Carthaginians on the sudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntari-ly dittons Romanes; subiect vnto Rome, should in continuance of the Storie, after a few lines, hold warre against Scipio, without any assistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleue, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, stirred vp the Illyrgetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whilst himselfe had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ranne away, and saued himselfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Countrey, was beaten by Asdrubal back to his ships, whence he durst not stirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time this Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Prouince, leauing some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio wanne, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for, through a deep snow. As for the Lactani, Illyrgetes, and the rest, we may reasonably thinke, that they fought their owne benefit: helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians, and contrariwise, vpon sense of injuries receiued, or apprehension of more grieuous tyrannie, vnder which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, harkning againe vnto the comfortable promises of those, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Countrey Lawes, and not vnder Governours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: euen from henceforth vnto the dayes of Augustus Caesar; till when they were neuer throughly conquered.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor; most of their men being on shore. All their ships, that ranne not too far on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defended. After this victorie, aboue one hundred and twentie Nations, or petty Estates, in Spaine, are said to haue submitted themselves vnto the Romans, and giuen Hostages: where by Asdrubal was compelled to flie into the vtmost corners of the land, and hide himselfe in Lusitania. Yet it followes; that the Illyrgetes did againe rebell; that Asdrubal herupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though hauing easily vanquished the Illyrgetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred vp against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subiects and had giuen him Hostages. These tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquished him in two battailes, wherein they flue fifteen thousand of his men, and rooke foure thousand Prisoners. Then arriued P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren ioyntly administered the businesse in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian warre; the two Scipios did, haud cunctantes, without feare or doubt, passe ouer Iberus, & besiege Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it, and, among many others, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal. Bostar, the Governour of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himselfe to be perswaded by one Accedus a Spaniard, that the only way to get the fauour and hearty good will of the Countrey, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages; as selling, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the craftie Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman Generalls: perswading them, as hee had done Nofar, to make the Liberalitie their owne. Herby the Romans purchased much loue: if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward and ere this we finde, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am wearie of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can beleuee so few. But since wee finde no better certainties, we must content our felues with these.

The yeere following was like vnto this: Asdrubal must be beaten againe. The two Scipio's diuide their forces: Cn. makes warre by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreatie, hath gotten foure thousand foot, and five hundred horse, out of Africa: He repairs his fleet; and provides every way to make resistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, resolt vnto the Romans: because they had bene chidden the last yeere for their negligence, which had betrayed the Nauie. The reuolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetanians, or Carpetani, an In-land people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. These doe much mischief, so that Asdrubal is faine to make a iourney to them. His sudden coming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assaile him, that they driue him, for very feare, to incampe himselfe strongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to giue them battaile. So they take a Towne by force, wherein he had laide vp all his provisions; and shortly make themselves Masters of the Countrey round about. This good successe breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Asdrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beats them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeeldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage; that Asdrubal should leade his Armie forth with into Italie: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to doe; if they had bene informed by his letters in what hard case he was; and had so weakly supplied him, as is shewed before. But thus we finde it reported: and that vpon the very rumour of this his iourne, almost all Spaine was readie to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therefore sends word presently to Carthage, that this must not be so: or, if they will needes haue it so, that then they must send him a Succes-
40 four, and well attended with a strong Armie, which to imploy they should finde worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generalls. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moued with this excuse: Asdrubal must needes be gone; and Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that seruice both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spaine. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to doe, than to furnish himselfe with store of monie, that hee might haue wherewithall to winne the friendship of the Gauls; through whose Countries hee must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembering to ease him of this care. But since it can bee no better, he laies great Impositions vpon all the Spaniards his subiects: & hauing gotten toge-
40 ther as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing these newes, are careful how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Riuer's name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal: who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather bee vanquished at home; than get the victorie, and afterwards be haled into Italie. Great numbers are slaine: and few should haue escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were thoroughly ioined. Their campe the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (question-50 less) they are maruailously enriched: all the monie that could bee raked together in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian Expedition. Their dayes euent ioyne all Spaine to the Romans, if any part of the Countrey stood in doubt before; and puts Asdrubal so farre from all thought of traouailing into Italie, that it leaues him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exploits aduertisement is sent to Rome;

Rome: and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are; That they haue neither monie, apparrell, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Armie and Fleet; That all is wanting; so as unless they may bee supplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. These Letters come to Rome in an euill season; the State being scarcely able, after the losse at Canna, to helpe it selfe at home. Yet relieue is sent: how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that loue and care, which the priuate Citizens of Rome bare vnto the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere, into the Relation of things whereof the truth is lesse questionable. At the coming of this supply, the two Scipio's pursue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we thinke; that remember the last newes of him, and how fearfully he mistrusted his owne safetie? They finde him, and Atago, and Amilcar the sonne of Bomilear, with an Armie of threecore thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Orelus, & others, probably conjecture to haue stood, where Cariuncna is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon; for there was Illiturgi, afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Illigetis their neerest Neighbours, for hauing resolted vnto the Romans. The Towne is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of victualles. The Romans therefore breake through betwene the Enemies camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them; and hauing victualled the place, encourage the townsmen to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against threecore thousand; and killing more of the 20 enemies, than themselves were in number, driue all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one, out of his quarter; and tooke that day, besides prisoners and other bootie, fiftie and eight Ensignes. The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Incibilis, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning monie by warre, for thus re-enforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had monie to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driuen to poll the Countrey, wanting monie of his owne; and being beaten in this iourne, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his campe was taken after the battaile by Ibera. Howsoeuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are beaten againe at Incibilis: where there were of them about threene thousand slaine, & about three 30 thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antius, or some other Historian, to whom Lince gave credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their owne side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are ouertrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is forced to make great haste ouer the Riuer. At Castellum altum, a place in the mid-way betwene new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, P. Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victualles, being strong and defencible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Countrey round about is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse haue charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off cleare, falling also vpon some stragglers, or such as lagged behinde their fellows in march, they haue cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behouefull, to retire vnto some place more assured. So Pub-
50 withdraws himselfe vnto Mons Victoria: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibilis, ouer-looks the Southerne Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repaires vnto him; and Asdrubal the sonne of Gefeo, with a full Armie, arrives to helpe his Companions. As they lie thus neere incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view the places therabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdrawes himselfe to an high peece of ground; where they besiege him, untill his brother Cn. Scipio fetch him off. After this (but I know not why) Casula, a great citie of Spaine, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being farre distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Beris. Neuertheless the Carthaginians passe over Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi againe, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to winne it by famine. Wee may justly wonder, what should moue them to neglect the rebellion of Casula, yea and the Roman Armie lying so close by them, and to seeke adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had beene so grievously beaten the yeere before. But thither they goe: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out vpon them the next day, and in two battailes kills about twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with sixe and thirtie Ensignes. This victorie (doubtlesse) is remaekable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than fise thousand men. The vanquished Cartha- ginians besiege Digarta: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Cartha- ginians remoue to Munda; where the Romans are loone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victorie; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirtie nine Elephants are killed; and twelue thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fiftie Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Aurige- ges; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kills not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Norwithstanding all these ouerthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed euen by nature to fed warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asdrubal: who hauing also hired some of the Gauls, adventures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe, and loofeth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen alhamed, to leaue Saguntum enthrall'd vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may wee thinke it strange, that they had not recovered it long before, since wee may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Countrie once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appears) to goe their way without it: so as they neede not to blush, for hauing so long for-borne to do that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe.

At the present they winne Saguntum: and restore the possession thereof vnto such of the poore disperfed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the Countrie of the Turdians, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue disturbed them, if they had beene able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, wee can perceiue none, than this recouerie of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals journe; which was indeede of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporia, an Haven towne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phocians, kinne to the Messians, friends to the Romans;
They haue easily wonne to their party, lost, recovered, and lost againe, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnstedfast passions; and now finally they haue wonne a Towne, whereof the Carthaginians held entire possession, who had rooted out the old Inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleeeue, that when they tooke Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surpris, which is to be suspected, since

in

in this Action we finde no particulars remembered, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal; they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight.
In like sort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembered, after eue-ry one of which Asdrubal fate down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Towne to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselves within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leuie and arriuall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had beene absolute Masters of the field, when they wanne Saguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeere following, in practising only with the Celtiberians the next adjoining people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeeres businesse. Of these Celtiberians we heare before, that they haue yielded vp themselves vnto the Romans; for securitie of their faith, giuen Hostages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians; with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and, not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman Campe.
How this may hold together I cannot perceiue; vnlesse perhaps in those dayes it were the Roman custome, or rather the custome of some bad Author whom Luce followes, to call euey Messenger, or straggler, that entred their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Armie of thirtie thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and carried into Italie, there to deale with their Countymen that follow Hanni- bal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne back into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he brings with him such newes of the riches and welfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellows at home are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall next haue a desire to leade them into Italie. Hereof wee finde more than probability, when these Mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this accesse of strength, diuide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies; who lie not farre off with three Armies. Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, is neerest at hand; euen among the Celtiberians, at Amitoris.
With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is fise daies march, and, by running into the furthest parts of the Countrie, saue themselves from being ouer-taken. Publius therefore must make the more hastie, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie, leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. Hee that hath the longer iourne to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his liues end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, are not studying how to runne away: they finde no such necessitie. They joyne their forces together; meet with P. Scipio; and lay at him so hardly, that he is driuen to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches: wherein he thinks himselfe not well assured. Especially he is vexed by Maianissa, Prince of the Massejssis, Numi- dians bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremisen: to whom the chiefe honor of this seruice is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis, a Spanish Prince, is comming with seven thousand and fise hundred of the Sussetani, to joyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut vp, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way; leaving T. Ponticus his Lieutenant, with a small companie, to defend the campe. He meets with Indibilis, but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first encounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appeare (whom he thought to haue bin ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Car- thaginians farre behinde; but come so fast vpon him in R. care, that P. Scipio, vncretaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where neede most requireth, is struck through with a lance, and flaine: very few of his Armie escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twentie dayes after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him; pretending that they had warre in their owne Countre. If Antistorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Otelius following Bauterus takes it; a Celtiberian Towne; this was no vaine pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly beleue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much monie for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazing their liues. Cn. Scipio therefore being vnable to slay them; and no lesse vnable, without their helpe, either to resist the Enemy, or to joyne with his Brother, makes a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plaine flight, that hee keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard vpon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, hauing made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steals from them all, by night; but is ouer-taken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stonie ground, where grows not so much as a shrub, vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill hee findes, of easie ascent on euery side, which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-laddies, and other luggage, for default of a better Palliade. These weake defences the Carthaginians soone care in funder: and, breaking 20 in on all hands, leaue very few of them alieue; that sauing themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoining, escape vnto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his camp, as is before said. It is a terrible ouerthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on euery side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to couer them, could breake out, and throw themselves within woods adjoining, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life, since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who ha- 30 uing gathered together the scattered Soldiers, & drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretie Armie. The Souldiers, being to chosse a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant; as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gesco, comming vpon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his men, (fondly weeping when hee led them forth, vpon remembrance of their more honourable Generalls lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessitie, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victorie perhaps he might haue gotten, but that he wisely sounds the retraits, reseruing the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at 40 first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse grows, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they returne to their former securitie; and vnterly despising him, let neither Corps d'eguard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neere. Martius therefore animates his souldiers with liuely wordes; and tells them, that there is no aduenture more safe, than that which is furthest from suspicion of being vnder-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate peece of seruice. So he leades them forth by night, and steals vpon the campe of Asdrubal: where finding no guard, but the enemies fast a sleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbins, and giues a terrible alarme; so that all afrighted, the Carthaginians runne head-long one vpon another, they know 50 not which way. All passages out of their campe Martius hath prepossest, so that there is no way to escape, save by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and runne away toward the campe of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay six miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley be-

tweene their two camps he hath beset a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall euery one, and are cut in peeces. But lest perchance any should haue escaped, and giue the alarme before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speede, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficulty he enters; and partly by force, partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and blouided with their former execution, He drives head-long into fight, all that can saue themselves from the fury of the sword. Thirtie seven thousand of the enemies perill in this 10 nights worke, besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, that are taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antias addes, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seven thousand slaine: and that in another battaile with Asdrubal, there were slaine tenne thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie, taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Liuius therefore hath elsewhere well obserued, that there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antias, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whilst Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Liuius reporteth as a common tale, not giuing thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, that this Captaine 20 Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in such distresse, He could clearly get off from the Enemies, and giue them any parting blow, though it were farre lesse than that which is here set downe.

Of these occurs L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good seruice, what soeuer it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might iudge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spain: which the better to intimate vnto them, He stiled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued with the tidings, than the case required: and therefore tooke such careful order, for supplying their forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies, leuied to serue in that Prouince, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the Citie it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for 30 Spain. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his presumption in vsurping it: foreseeing well, that it was a matter of ill consequence, to haue the souldiers abroad make choice, among themselves, of those that should command Armies and Prouinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all conuenient haste, into Spain: carrying with him about sixe thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman Horse, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome beganne to prosper in Italie, and afforded means of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the victories of Martius would ill haue serued, either to keepe footing in Spain, or to 40 stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Armie, which was vnder Martius & Fonteius; he found suter tokens of the ouerthrowes received, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Roman partie was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaim, it could not easily be deuised. Yet Claudius aduanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Asitani, neere enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides Atri; out of which there was no issue, but only through a sleight, whereon the Roman seized at his first comming. What should haue tempted any man of vnderstanding to incampe in such a place, I 50 doe not finde: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart forth-with out of all Spain, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence dismissed; that he spent many daies, in entertaining parlee with Claudius about this businesse, that night by night hee coueied his foot-men

(a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a mistie day, Hee stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his campe empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generalls in Spain; we shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Countrie, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the foot-men could hardly creepe out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke mistie day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to haue bene of farre lesse value. Howsoever it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deserts, had repealed their Election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) yong Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignitie, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians; and the beloued memorie of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reuiued in one of the same Familie. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spain.

This is that P. Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africke: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Countrie. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned; especially he excelled in Temperance, Continencie, Bountie, and other Vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, fauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanitie; How he vied to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must haue bene one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed with his Mother, entering her chamber often, and vanishing away at the coming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than mere fables, deuised by Historians, who fought thereby to adde vnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not only to haue surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generallitie, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as a matter of vnquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Captainie of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the People of Rome were much astonished therat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them hauing the heart, to aduenture himselfe in such a desperate seruice; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twentie yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where hee might be scene of all the Multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captaines, who durst not follow Claudius, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Prouince, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the too partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain; and with him was joyned M. Iunius Silanus, as Propretor, and his Coadiutor. They carried with them ten thousand foot, and

and a thousand horse, in thirtie Quingentum Gallies. With these they landed at Euporia; and marched from thence to Tarraco along the Sea-coast. At the time of Scipio arrivall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Prouince: which he entertained with such a majestic, as bred a wonderful opinion of him. As for the Enemies, they were greatly afraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could giue any reason of it. It wee must beleue this, then must wee needs beleue, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so yong a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeere) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with five and twentie thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; his Sea-forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arrived there together with him. Hee assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wanne it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might haue been well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarraco had not discovered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walls; whereof the Townsmen themselves were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation, standing vpon a demi-land, betwene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarraco had founded; and finding in some part thereof a helpe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deepe, or (at most) wading vp to the Naui, Scipio thrust thercinto some Companies of his men; who recovered the top of the walls without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the natural strength. These falling suddenly vpon the backs of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Armie. What bootie was found within the Towne, Liue himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is saide to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasure, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanitie it was to say, That all the wealth of Africke and Spain, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adjoining Prouinces) whom Scipio entreated with singular courtelie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Coliberrians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lactani, neereit Neighbours to Tarraco, and dwelling on the North side of Iberus, forsooke the Carthaginian partie; and joyined with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended; for that he did not want himselfe, as commonly fugitiues vse, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in revolting from their Enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and invited by the honorable dealing of Scipio. This temperate estimation of his new professed friendship, was indeede no vntrue token, that it should be long-lasting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we haue heard before) forsaken the Carthaginian partie, and stoutly held themselves as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing haue bene deuised more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King, excusing, as new, his taking part with the same, when he should haue rather craued pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Most likely therefore it is, that howloer the two elder Scipios had gotten some few places among these their Neighbours, and held them by strength; yet were the Romans neuer Masters of the Countrie, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hostages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in sending them home, wanne vnto himselfe the assured loue and assistance of these Princes. The Carthaginian Generalls, when they heard of this litle, were very forrie: yet neuerthelesse they set a good face on the matter; saying, That a young man, hauing stolne a Towne by surpris, was too farre transported, and ouer-joyed, but that shortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Now if I should here interpose mine owne conjecture; I should bee bold to say, That the Carthaginians were at this time busie, in setting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occasion, fate downe before Ibera. And in this respect I would suppose, that it had not been much amiss, if the passage ouer the Lake had bene vndiscovered, and the Towne held out some longer while. For howsoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to such good issue vpon the first day: yet in the generalitie of the businesse, betwene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should bee staied from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spain should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingering warre of taking and retaking Townes, whilst the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Asdrubal, the sonne of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprise: euen to fight in triall of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whether he ran for feare, as thinking himselfe ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, comming vpon Asdrubal, his Vancourers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they draue them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, euen by that small peece of seruice, how full of spirit the Roman Armie was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with a Riuer, very steepe of ascent, and not easie of access on the fore side; by which himselfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whercon he strongly incamped himselfe: and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plaine, into which he descended, more vpon brauery, that he might not seeme to hide himselfe within his Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Armie to the hazard of a battell, for which this was no equal ground. But such aduantage of place could not saue him from the Romans. They climed vp the Hill to him; they recovered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill-top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants belowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long. I know not wither: for it is said, that there was no way to flie. Out of such a battell, whercon he lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to haue escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troupes, to haue marched towards the Pyrennes, hauing sent away his Elephants ere the fight beganne. Neuerthelesse, Mago, and Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, are reported after this, to haue consulted with him about this warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe he needs must, were it but to carrie all the Spaniards as farre as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue been true, it shall appeare at his comming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affaires, haue too long detained vs.

§. XII.

§. XII.

The great troubles that HANNIBAL raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome.
POSTHUMIUS the Roman General, with his whole Armie, is slaine by the Gauls.
PHILIP King of Macedon, enters into a League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Romans toyning with the Aetolians, make warre vpon PHILIP in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

10 I left Hannibal wintering at Cyna: where hee and his new Confederates reioyced (as may bee thought) not a litle, to heare the good newes from Carthage of such mightie aide, as was decreed to be sent thence vnto him. In former times hee had found worke enough, to carrie the Romans come into his own barres, and to driue away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him litle other profit, then sustenance for his Armie; by making him Master of the open field. Hee might perhaps haue forced some walled Townes, in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Citie of Canna: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; 20 30 40 50 hunger, that his Armie must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill come were ripe, would haue grieuouly punished him for such imploiment of the Summer. This may haue bene the reason, why hee forbore to adventure vpon Rome after his victorie at Canna. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carrie the Citie at his first comming; want of victuals would haue compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea, many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious success, would haue taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battell: if being, either for want of means to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walls of Rome, hee had presented himselfe vnto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receiue a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subiection. Thus the Winter was passed ouer joyfully, sauing that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to second the welcom report of those mightie forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arriued no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we find, that after this he had about thirtie of them; whereas all, saue one, that hee brought ouer the Alpes, had been lost in his journey through the marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what mischiefs the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too nigardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spain and Gauls, as hee himselfe had done; and increase the Armie by hiring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the maine strength of the Citie, to the hazard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Hauens, to receiue the fleet that should carrie such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull provisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere serued hee tooke the field: and hauing finished what rested to be done at Castellum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Hauens towne thereabout; that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian fleet; or take from his Enemies

ENEMIES

Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilco vnto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Iles of Sicily and Sardinia, since the liege of Rome mult needes bee deferred vnto another yeere. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Scampronius Longus: who lue about two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, hee wanne Petelia or Pettia by force; after it had held out some moneths. Hee wanne likewise Consentia; and Crotom, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the Citie of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded vnto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Towne of Rhegium, ouer-against Sicily.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthie to be recorded, as a notable testimonie of the good gouernement, vnder which the Roman subjects liued. As for the Samnites, Campani, and others, whole carnellinesse in rebellion may seeme to proue the contrarie; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Souerainetie, and were now transported with ambition: which Reason can hardly moderate, or Benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers receiued answer from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not left meanes, to relieue their Associates: that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers (Embassadours they are termed, as were all others, publicly sent from Cities of the Roman subiection, that had a private iurisdiction within themselves) fell downe to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to giue them away: promising to doe and suffer whatsoever was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and hauing thoroughly considered all their forces remaining, plainly confessed, that it was not in their power to giue any reliefe. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne safetie, as hauing already discharged their faith to the vtmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths: and hauing striuen in vaine to defend themselves, when there was no apparant possibilitie, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloudie victorie ouer them; being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time wereindeede in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas, in a great braunrie, before their losse at Cannae, they had shewed their high mindes, by entreating the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them so neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better then at home. L. Posthumus Albinus their Pretor they had sent, with an Armie of five and twentie thousand, into Gaul; to the Illyrian King Pineus they had sent for their Tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if hee desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that he should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subiect and Rebell, whom he had receiued. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little futable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumus with all his Armie was cut in peeces by the Gauls, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litane, through which he was to pass. Against his comming, the Enemies had sawed the Trees so farre, that a little force would serue to cast them downe. When therefore Posthumus, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gauls, that lay about the Wood, beganne to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were ouerwhelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before.

How

How this tedious worke, of sawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither bee perceiued, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might haue blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the deuiue was subiect; I doe not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may haue beene done; and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthe to be omitted, as a monument of the savage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Countrie now so ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Posthumus his skull, being cleawed, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessell, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no lesse than the calamitie. But sorrow could giue no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none: neither doe I finde, that any was a second time demanded; thus we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus Illyrian Kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few yeeres following, the Romans dealt vpon euil tearmes; entreating their assistance against Philip and Perseus; not commanding their dutie, as Vassalls. The Macedonians troubled them yet a little further. For hauing assured his affaires in Greece, and enjoying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, Hee sent Embassadours to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, vpon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman warre, vntill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoile therein to bee gotten, should bee left entire vnto the State of Carthage; And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, vntill hee had subdued all his Enemies: (which were the Aetolians, Thracians, King Antiochus, and others) leauing semblably vnto him the full possession of that Countrie, and the Iles adioyning. But such predisposition of Kingdomes and Provinces, is lightly controlled by the diuine Providence, which therein shewes it selfe not (as Herodotus falsely termes it, and like an Atheist) enuious or malicious, but very iust and majesticall; in vp-holding that vnspcakable greatnesse of Souerainetie, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadours that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their iourne towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, aduentured vpon a bold lie, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessitie. These newes were so welcome, that the ioy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquirie. So they were louingly sealed; and friendly dismissed, with guides that should leade them the way, and shew them how to auoide the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their iourne, fell wilfully into the Campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion; and concluded the businesse, about which they came, vpon the points before remembered. In their returne homeward, they happened againe vnluckily to bee descried by the Roman fleet; which, mistrusting them to bee of the Carthaginian partie, gaue them chase. They did their best to haue escaped: but being ouer-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboard; and trusting to the lie that once had serued them, said it againe, That hauing been sent from King Philip, to make a League with the People of Rome, they were not able, by reason of the Carthaginians lying betwene, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Pretor, vnto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now lesse credible than before; and (which marred all) Gisco, Bostar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquisition serued to finde all out: so that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole businesse confessed. The Embassadours and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaves. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon a new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speede; concluding, as was agreed before; onely with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heauie weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them; when their shoulders were ouer-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and futeable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would haue beaten vpon them Spaine. They iudged it more easie, with small forces to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resit him in Italie. And herein they were in the right. For that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, joining with Hannibal in such a time, would haue sufficed to shake the allegiance not onely of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subiects, but euén of the Roman Colonies that held all priuiledges of the Citie, it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Pretor, with twentie Quinquere Gallies, was appointed to attend vpon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece; or to nourish the troubles already therein begunne. Philip was buisie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italie, setting vpon Apollonia; and thence sailing vpon Oricum; which he wanne, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epirots craued helpe of M. Valerius; or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townsmen in good order; but not to keepe out the Romans of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thousand men, vnder Nautius Crispus, an vnder-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. These made a notable sallie; and brake into Philips Trenches with so great slaughter, that they forced him to forsake his camp, & raise the siege. The King purposed (as it is said) to haue departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, comming with his fleet from Oricum, stopped vp the mouth of the Riuer; so that hee was faine to burne his ships, (which belike were no better than long boats) and depart ill furnished of carriages, by Land. After this, Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwaies enemie to the Crowne of Macedon; and easily perswaded them (being so affected, as hath elsewhere bene shewed) to make strong warre on Philip; wherein he promised them great assistance from the Romans. That which most moued the troublesome spirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promise, as it already it had bene his owne. So a league was made betweene them: and afterward solemnely published at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Cercyra, in which space Acarnania was contained, all the Countrie should bee subdued, and left vpon the Ætolians, the pillage onely to beguén to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it shuld be with Prouision, to hold no longer, than whilest he abstained from doing iniurie to the Romans, or their Associates. This was indeede the onely point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promised as much on the Roman behalfe, That they should not make peace with the Macedonian, vnlesse it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this League was place referred for the Lacedemonians and Eleans, as to those that had made or fauoured the side of Cleomenes against the Macedonian, to enter at their pleasure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the first of which reigned at Pergamus, in Asia the lesse, a Prince hereafter much to bee spoken of; the other two held some part of Thrya, about which the Romans were so farre from contending with them, that gladly they sought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of these Associates, are thrust into the Treatie; rather to giue it countenance, than for any readinesse readinesse which they disclosed to enter therein. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Dorymealus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generals must make much; as the late French King, Henric the fourth, when he had only the title of Nauarre, was said to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard wherevnto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Thyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger: to infect the Kingdome of Macedon; waited the Countrie about Oricum and Apollonia; and ouer-running the Pelagians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came downe into Thessalie, whence hee made 10 shew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to stirre vp all the Greekes adjoining, against the Ætolians, whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublefome to all the Countrie. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perseus, his sonne & heire, with foure thousand men, vpon their borders: with the rest of his Armie, before greater businesse should ouer-take and entangle him. He made a long iourne into Thrace, against a people called the Sedes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, whensoever the King was absent. The Ætolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians, in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrie, ere hee should bee able to returne. Hereto it 20 much auailed, that the Romans had already taken Oenade and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes, conueniently situated to let in an Armie; and conigned them vnto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contratt lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we say) euery Mothers sonne of them, in defence of their Countrie; together with the great hate of the Macedonian (who laied aside all other businesse) to succour these his friends; caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprife. When this Expedition was giuen ouer, the Romans and Ætolians fell vpon Antiochia, which they tooke: the Romans assailing it by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Towne, and the Romans the spoile.

For these good seruices M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpicius 30 sent in his stead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman helpe, Attalus out of Asia came ouer to assist the Ætolians. He was chiefly moued, by his owne ialousie of Philips greatnesse: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity, of being chosen by the Ætolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being ioyned with the maine power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome Neighbours desired peace of him, and vied their best meanes to get it. But when the day, appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadors, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intolerable 40 conditions, as ill befemed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their mindes were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being beleiged in their owne Townes, that had made them delirious of composition. This feare being taken away, by the encouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a Garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis; which threatned Achaea, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Naupactus, wasted the Countrie in a terrible brauerie: wherein Philip requited them; comming vpon them in halfe from the Neuemean Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Prusias King of Bitlynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip; sent a Naue into 50 Greece, to assist the Macedonian partie. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reason; as being more interested in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships; yet the Vessels were were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinquagesims. Wherefore it behewed him, to vñe the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fasting vpon any part of Greece; than afterwards it could serue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Countrey. Ere Philip could attempt anything by Sea; it was needfull that he should correct the Eleians, bad Neighbours to the Achaïans his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Towne, hee was encountered by the Ætolian and Roman Garrison; which draue him back with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intends a great conuersion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. Philip had received no great detriment, in his retreat from Elis: rather he had giuen testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleians, to the number of foure thousand; with some twentie thousand head of Cattle, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Countrey was invaded. But it had happened, that in his pursuit of the Roman foragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily vnder a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Crest. This was gathered vp by an Ætolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philip's death. The horse was well known, and the tale beleued. All Macedon therefore was in an vpror: and not onely the Borderers, ready to fall vpon the Countrey, but some Captaines of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselves a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse.

 Hereupon the King returned home; leauing not three thousand men, to assill his friends the Achaïans. He also tooke order, to haue Beacons erected; that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings; vpon whom hee meant shortly to returne. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly established. But in Greece all went ill-fauo-redly: especially in the Ile of Eubœa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus, and the Romans, the Towne of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to helpe it; where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue bene lost, if hee had not come the sooner.
 He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus.
 This Citie, lying ouer against Eubœa, Attalus had wonne more through the cowar-dize of the people, than any great force that he had vsed. Now because the Roman souldiers had defrauded him in the sack of Oreum, and taken all to themselves: it was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilst he was busie, in drawing as much monie as he could out of the Citizens: the sudden tidings of Philip's arriual, made him leaue all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-side, where he got aboard his ships; finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignitie of this misadventure; or tidings of Prusias the Bithynian his inuasion vpon the Kingdome of Pergamus; made Attalus returne home, without staying to take leaue of his friends.
 So Philip recovered Opus; wonne Torone, Tritones, Drymus, and many small townes in those parts; performing likewise some Actions, of more brauerie than importance, against the Ætolians. In the meane season, Adschemidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had bene busie in Peloponnesus; but hearing of Philip's arriual, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Ægypt, went about to choose two new Kings; and to conformance themselves to their old manner of Governement. But their estate was so farre out of tune, that their hope of redressing things within the Citie, proued no lesse vnfortunate, than had bene their attempts of recouering a large Dominion abroad. Lycorgus a Tyrant rose vp among them: vnto whom succeeded this Machinidas; and shortly after came Nabis, that was worse than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman side, for feare of the Achaïans; that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely

tremely the name both of Tyrant, and of Lacedæmonian. But of these wee shall speake more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaïa, and seeing his presence had brought the contentment of assurance to that Countrey; spake braue words to the Assembly of their States, saying, That he had to doe with an Enemy, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Oreum, to Opus, and now into Achaïa: but could no where finde them; such haile they made, for feare of being ouer-taken. But flight, He said, was not alwaies prosperous: He should one day light vpon them; as ere this hee sundrie times had done, and fill to their losse. The Achaïans were glad to hear these words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee restored vnto their Nation some Townes, that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewise to the Me-galopoltians their Confederates, He rendred Aliphera. The Dymeans, that had bene taken by the Romans, and sold for slaues, He fought out, ransomed, and put in quiet possession of their owne Citie. Further, passing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, Hee fell vpon the Ætolians: whom he draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their strongest holds; and waited their Countrey. This done, Hee tooke leaue of the Achaïans: and returning home by Sea, visited the people that were his subjects, or dependants: and animated them so well, that they reled fearelesse of any threatening danger. Then had he leisure to make warre vpon the Dardaniens, ill Neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuertheless he was not so farre occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himselfe Master of the Sea; the Romans (since the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or pursue him, when he lately ranne along the coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good successe added much reputation to the Macedonian; and emboldened him to make strong warre vpon the Ætolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans; either some displeasure, conceiued against their Confederates; or some feare of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall vpon Italie, caused them to giue 30 ouer the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their own fortunes.
 The Ætolians therefore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to sue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euir conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirtie fise Gallies, came ouer in great haile (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, hee turned aside to Dyrrachium, and Apollonia; making a great noyse, as if with these his owne forces he would work wonders. But it was not long, ere his ip came to visit him; and found him tame enough. The King presented him battaile: but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to walke the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himselfe close with-40 in the walls of Apollonia; making some Ouerures of peace: which caused Philip to returne home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in euill part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the Royall offer that he made them, to serue their turne in Italie, and assill them in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital:
 they had not sent any Fleet, as in reason they ought, and as considering his want of sufficient abillitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to secure the transportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Pyracies. Only onct they came to his helpe, which was, at his last iourne into Achaïa. But they were gone againe before his arriual: hauing done nothing, and pretending feare of 50 being taken by the Romans, euen at such time as Philip, with his owne Naue, did boldly passe by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This rechelesse dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seme to haue bene one of Hannos his tricks; whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this malicious man exceedingly to heare, that so great a King made offer to serue in person vnder Hannibal,

Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affaires of the World at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as Enius could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thrifte course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian waies so mightie a Prince, whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection vnto Hannibal, more dangerous to their libertie. Rather they should doe well to saue charges: and feede the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet, and some other succours. This would cost nothing: yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home; that might finde this Enemie worke abroad. So should 10 the Roman Armies be lessened in Italie; and Philip, when once he was engaged in the warre, be vrged vnto the prosecution, by his owne necessitie: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges; yea scarce to the labour of giuing him thanks. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal euery day did promise, that Rome, and all Italie, should within a while bee at the deuotion of Carthage: better it were that the Citie should bee free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betwene them and the Macedonians, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africa, should wait vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries. As would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the countaile of Hanno and his fellows, were such as this; or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition without his aduice, were too sparing, and carelesse, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in that little courtlike which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why hee begonne the building of an hundred Gallies, as if hee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would haue reached, had he not vainely giuen credit to faithlesse promises. When therefore the 20 Italians had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him: with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to haue succoured them in their necessitie, He might giue ouer the warre, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For hee had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes: but they despised him, as if the quarrell were merely his owne, and hee vnable to manage it. The vanitie of which their conceits would appeare vnto them: when they should see that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the yeere following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retain three or foure 30 Townes of Thyria, which they had recovered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian Conquest: Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the covenants, that somewhat might seeme to haue been gotten. On the other side, the Attinians were appointed to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably conjectures) the people of the Countie about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appeares, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependents of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achaens, Boeotians, Thesalians, Acarnanians, and Epirots. On the Roman side were named, first, the People of Ilium, as an honorable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis, the Tyrant of Lacedaemon; together with the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. The Etolians were omitted, belike, as hauing agreed for themselves before. But the Eleans and Messenians, followers of the Etolians; (and by them, as is most likely, comprised in their League with Philip) were were also infected by the Romans; that were neuer slow in offering their friendship to small and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they stood much vpon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great Actions. Yet the setting downe of their name in this Treatie, serued the Romans to good purpose: forasmuch as they were a busie people; and ministred occasion to renew the Warre, when meanes did better serue to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans beganne to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieving the publike necessities of their Common-wealth.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing so many Enterprises at once, they followed all by the halues: and waited more men and monie to no purpose, than would haue serued (if good order had beene taken) to finish the whole warre, in farre shorter space; and make themselves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error 20 had beene the lesse harmefull, if their care of Italie had beene such as it ought. But they suffered Hannibal, to wearie himselfe with expectation of their promised supplies: which being still deferred from yeere to yeere, caused as great opportunities to be lost, as a conquerour could haue desired. The death of Peplosimus, and destruction of his whole Armie in Gaulle; the begunne rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuse; with great alterations, much to their prejudice, in the whole Ile of Sicill; as also that Warre, of which we last spake, threatened from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that so neerely after their terrible ouerthrow at Canna, among so many reuolts of their Italian Confederates; would vtterly haue funke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the first yeere, yet 30 at least the second, sent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuerfitee of great hopes, appearing from all parts, administered matter vnto Hanno, or such as Hanno was, whercupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italie: yet could not that proportion hold, when so many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care; and required their several Armies. This had not been a very bad excuse, if any one of the many occasions offered had been thoroughly prosecuted: though it stood with best reason, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the prosperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, should haue beene strengthened; whatsoever had become of the rest. But the slender troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spain; the lingering aide which they sent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already wel-neere beauen downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongst all these their attempts) their hasty catching at Sicill: little deferred to be thought good reasons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the rest had reference. Rather euery one of these Actions, considered apart by it selfe, was no otherwise to be allowed as discreetly vnder-taken, or substantially followed; than by making supposition, That the care of Italie, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things else. Yet if these allegations would not serue to content Hannibal, then must he patiently endure to know, that his owne Citizens were jealous of his Greatnesse, and durst not trust him with so 30 much power, as should enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatsoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himselfe to Necessitie; to feede his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Neples, Naples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to spend his Armie in an hard siege, that was to be reserved for a worke of more importance. Many offers hee made vpon upon Nola; but alwaies with bad successe. Once Marcellus fought a battaile with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; hauing the assistance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman side, since the Heads, that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thousand men Hannibal in that fight lost: which was no great maruaile; his forces being then diuided, and imployed in sundrie parts of Italie at once. Naples was, euen in those daies, a strong Citie; and required a yeeres worke to haue taken it by force. Wherefore the earnest desire of Hannibal to get it, was alwaies frustrate. Vpon the Towne of Cuma they of Capua had their plot and were in hope to take it by cunning. They sent to the chiefe Magistrates of the Cumans, desiring them (as being also Campanians) to be present at a solemn sacrifice of the Nation, where they would consult about their generall good: promising to bring thither a sufficient guard, to assure the whole Assembly, from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made shew to entertaine; but priuily sent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Consul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre; and happily chosen Consul in so dangerous a time. His Colleague should haue bene Posthumius Albinus, that was lately slaine by the Gauls: after whose death Marcellus was chosen; as being judged the fittest man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found some religious impediment, that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at least they feared so to haue done. because this was the first time, that euer two Plebeian Consuls were chosen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was substituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the Citie, about matters of Religion, or Superstition: wherewith Rome was commonly, especially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Consular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campanians: not able to meet the Enemy in field; yet intente to all occasions, that should be presented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had bene armed, were no small part of his followers. These, and the rest of his men, hee continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Armes skillfull in the exercises of warre; than to keepe it from quarrels, that might arise by vpbraiding one another with their base condition.

Whilest the Consul was thus buied at Linternum; the Senators of Cuma sent him word, of all that had passed betwene them and the Capuans. It was a good occasion to shew his men, and make them confident against the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himselfe into Cuma: whence he issued at such time, as the Magistrates of that Citie were expected by the Campanians. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hama, three miles from Cuma. There lay Marius Alfusus the chiefe Magistrate of Capua, with fourteen thousand men: not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather desiring how to surpris others, than fearing himselfe to be assailed. The Consul therefore, suffering none to goe forth of Cuma, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, issued out of the Towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreshed with meat and sleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights seruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and slew more than two thousand of them, together with their Commander; looting not aboue an hundred of his owne men. Their campe hee took: but carried not long to rise it, for feare of Hannibal; who lay not farre off. By this his providence, He escaped a greater losse, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was enformed how things went at Hama, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to finde those yong souldiers, and slaues, buied in making spoile, and loading themselves with the bootie. But they were all gotten safe within Cuma; which partly for anger, partly for desire of gaining it, & partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal assailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill successe, the the Carthaginians and their fellows spent, about this Towne. They raised a wooden Tower against it: which they brought close vnto the walls; thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inside of the wall, raised against this an higher Tower: whence they made resistance; and found meanes at length, to consume with fire the worke on their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were buie in quenching the fire; the Romans, falling out of the Towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their trenches, with the slaughter of about fourtene hundred. The Consul wisely founded the Retreat; ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readinesse to requite their seruice. Neither would he, in the pride of this good successe, aduventure forth against the Enemy; who presented him battell the day following, neere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, seeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the siege; and returned to his old Campe at Tifata. About these times, and shortly after, when Fabius the other Consul had taken the field; some small Townes were recouered by the Romans, and the people eueryly punished for their revolt.

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with Garrisons all places that had yielded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome if selfe, was driven in the meane time to alter his course of warre: and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a general insuaion vpon the whole Country, to passe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew day more commodious to the enemy, than to himes. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samnit was grievously waied by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal; as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the losse before mentioned, was gone to Winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soueraigntie. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old the more easie means, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intente, as necessitie constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and ioynd with him M. Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeere before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, that he himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand vpon nice points of formalitie, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to be chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the Citie stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made; serued to put the Campanians in feare, that Capua it selfe should bee besieged. To prevent this, Hannibal at their earnest entreatie came from Arpi: (where he lay, harkning after newes from Tarentum), and hauing with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Puteoli a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three daies in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The Garrison in Puteoli was fixe thousand strong: and did their dutie so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could onely shew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assailed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whilest he was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a iourne against Beneuentum; and T. Gracchus the last yeeres Consul, halting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanno had with him about fouteene thousand Foot, Brutians and Lucans for the most part: besides twelue hundred Horse; vnto which commonalty being obnoxious vnto the Censors; which were alwaies of that Order, and careful to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impoverished by warre, and hauing small store of Lands to let, or of Customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed Places, that needed reparations: or if they tooke a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to let any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generositie of the Romans. They that had bene accustomed, in more happie times, to vndertake such peeces of worke, offered now themselves as willingly to the Censors, as if there had bene no such want: promising liberally their cost and travell; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had bene enfranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forebare the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as euery one was able, the common necessitie; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widdowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Quæstor kept a booke, of all that was laid out for the sustentance of these Widdowes and Orphans: whilest the whole stocke was vied by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercinaries, that did accept it, when their countrie was in so great want.

The twelve hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yielded halfe so much commoditie, as might bee laid in ballance against these miseries, wherinto their Estate was now reduced. Neuerthelesse, if wee consider things aright; the calamities of this Warre did rather enable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom shee forth-with vnder-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto shee attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names wee haue already mentioned. For by this hampering, the Roman metall grew more hard and solide: and by paring the branches of priuate fortunes, the Roote and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to ashes, and taken from euery particular Citizen all hope of other felicitie, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the vniuersalitie. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath iudiciously obserued) That a State, whose dimension or stемme is small, may aptly serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to passe, where all regard of domesticall prosperitie is laid aside; and euery mans care addressed to the benefit of his countrie. Hercof I might say, that our Age hath seene a great example, in the vnited Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Townes, or almost of their Families, perceived it selfe to hold, whilest the Generalitie was oppressed by the Duke of Alua; were it so, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme indurie, and straining themselves to fill their publike Treasurie, they are all growne wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their seruices by Land. Wherefore if wee valew at such a rate as wee ought, the patient Resolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and, aboue all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the Citie was neuer in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being growne more large and beautifull, should in all reason haue been more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Alexa had not infected infected them with sensualitie, and carried their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens, and Subiects of Rome could haue beleueed their owne interrest to be as great, in those waies which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded vpon so great vertue, could not haue bene throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer so many. But vnto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though hee hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of those waies, by which Kingdomes rise and fall; yet hath left him subiect vnto the affections, which draw on these fatall changes, in their 10 times appointed.

p. XIII.

The Romans win some Townes back from HANNIBAL. HANNIBAL winnes Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of HANNIBAL. The course of HANNIBAL to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

20 S the People of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the warre: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of indurie, in seeking to recouer what had bene lost. The Towne of Castine Fabius beleeged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to haue bene relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Neuerthelesse the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to giue it ouer: saying, that the enterprife was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrarie opinion. He said, That many such things, as were not at first to haue been vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to bee prosecuted vnto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Towne was pressed so hard, that the Campani dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craved parlee; offering to giue it vp, so as all might haue leaue to depart in safetie, whither they pleased. Whilest they were thus treating of conditions: or whilest they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diuersly reported) Marcellus, seizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fiftie of those that were first gotten out, ranne to Fabius the Consul: who saued them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slaine, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserued commendations, by holding his word good vnto these fiftie; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such, as escaped the heat of execution, could bee excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himselfe, after the Roman fashion, with some equiuocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marsam in Gascogne taken by the Marhall Montuc, when I was a young man in France. For whilest he entertained parlee about composition; the besieged ranne all from their severall guards, vpon halfe desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marhall therefore discovering a part of the walls vnguarded, entred by Scalado; and put all saue the Gouverneur vnto the sword. Herein that Gouverneur of Mount Marsam committed two grosse errors; the one, in that hee gaue no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themselves in their places; the other, in that hee was content to parlee, without pledges for assurance giuen and received. Some such ouer-sight, the Gouverneur of Castine seemeth to haue committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Montuc, was very honourable. When this Worke was ended, many small Townes of the Samnites, and some of the Lucans and Apulians, were requeered: wherein were taken, or slaine, about five and twentie thousand of the Enemies; and the Countrie grievously walted by Fabius, Marcellus lying sicke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum; waiting to heare from those, that had promised to give vp the Towne. But M. Valerius, the Roman Propretor, had thrust so many men into it, that the Traitors durst not stirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian was faine to depart; having wearied himselfe in vaine with expectation. Yet he walted not the Countrie; but contented himselfe with hope; that they would please him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: which he chose for his wintering place; and beganne to victuall it, when Summer 10 was but halfe past. It is said, that he was in loue with a yong Wenche in that towne: in which regard if he beganne his Winter more timely, than otherwise neede required, He did not like the Romans; whom necessitie enforced, to make their Summer last as long, as they were able to trauell vp and downe the Countrie.

About this time beganne great troubles in Sicily; whither Marcellus the Consul was sent, to take such order for the Prouince, as neede should require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than his Consulship, we will speake hereafter.

The new Consuls, chosen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the sonne of the present Consul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time. The Romans found it needfull for the publique seruice, to employ often-times their best able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the war, to recontinue their Officers, and choose such, as had lately held their places before; without regarding any distance of time, which was otherwise required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his sonne: which was perhaps the respect, that most commended his sonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his sonne rode forth to meete him: cleuen of the twelue Lictors, which carried each an axe with a bundle of rods before the Consul, suffered him, in regard of due reuerence, to passe by them on horse-backe; which was against the custome. But the sonne perceiving this, commanded the last of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Consul on his feete. The father chearefully did so; saying, It was my minde, sonne, to make triall, whether thou diddest vnderstand thy selfe to bee Consul. 30

Cassius Albinus a wealthie Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Canna, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Towne, seeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend; came priuily to this Consul Fabius, and offered to render it back vnto him, if he might bee therefore well rewarded. The Consul purposed to follow old examples: and to make this Albinus a patterne to all Traitors; vsing him, as Camillus and Fabritius had done those, that offered their vnfaithful seruice against the Falsisti, and King Pyrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and said, it was a matter of dangerous consequence, That it should be thought more safe to reuolt from the Romans, than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that hee should be sent to the Towne of Cades, and there kept as prisoner; vntill they could better resolue, what to doe with him, or what vse to make of him. Hannibal, vnderstanding that Albinus was gone, and among the Romans, tooke it not forrowfully; but thought this a good occasion, to seize vpon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet, that he might seeme rather suere, than couetous, He sent for the wife and children of Albinus into his campe: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more strictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the Treason, to be burnt aliue; and tooke all their goods vnto himselfe. Fabius the Consul shortly after came to Arpi: which he wanne by Scalado, in a stormie and rainie night. Five thousand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the Towne; and of the Arpines themselves, there were about three thousand. These were thrust forsooth by the Carthaginian Garrisons, when it was vnderstood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the souldiers held the townsmen suspected; 50 suspected; and therefore thought it no wisdom, to trust them at their backs. But after some litle resistance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: protesting, that they had bene betrayed by their Princes; and were become subject to the Carthaginians, against their wills. In proceesse of this discourse, the Arpine Pretor went vnto the Roman Consul: and recueing his faith for security of the Towne, presently made head against the Garrison. This notwithstanding; like it is, that Hannibals men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leaue their companions, and serue on the Roman side; it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered 10 to passe forth quietly, and returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman againe; with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time, Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cneius Fulvius, another of the Pretors, an hundred and twelue Gentlemen of Capua offered their seruice; vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods restored vnto them, when their Citie should bee recovered by the Romans.

This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it serued to discouer the inclination of the Italians in those times; and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had bene promised from Carthage. The 20 Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Britains, that had yielded themselves to Hannibal; returned againe to their old allegiance. Others would haue followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himself a Captaine, and gotten reputation by some pettie exploits in foraging the country, was slaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum; which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing out that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to passe: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligence; He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore Townes of the 30 Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Phileas, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassador, praistling with the Hostages of the Tarentines, & such as had the keeping of them, conueighed them by night out of the Citie. But hee and his companie were the next day so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome; where they suffered death, as Traitors. By reason of this crueltie, or seueritie, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently; as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discouered. Wherefore they sent againe to Hannibal: and ac- 40 quainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philonetes, two the chiefe among them, vied much to goe forth of the Towne on hunting by night; as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for feare of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not seeme to haue bene abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three daies iourne to Tarentum, if hee should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place the lesse to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure. He caused it to be giuen out, that he was sicke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were 50 growne carelesse of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had let their businesse in order; He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot; and long before brake of day, made all speede thitherward. Foure score light horse of the Numidians ranne a great way before him, beating all the waies, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be discouered.

covered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when hee heard tell in the evening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged; and gaue order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night, Hannibal, guided by Philemenes, came close to the towne; where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arrivall; Nico, that was within the Towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was readie. Presently Nico beganne to fet vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philemenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his manner) called vp the Porter; bidding him make haste, for that hee had killed a great Bore, so heauie, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two young men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to bee worthe the looking on. While the Porter stood wondering at the largenesse of the beast, Philemenes ran him through with his Bore-speare: and letting in some thirtie armed men, fell vpon all the watch; whom when he had slaine, he entred the great gate. So the Armie of Hannibal, entring Tarentum at two gates, went directly toward the Market-place; where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall, and sent into all quarters of the Citie, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans; and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in fight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the Towne was in an vpror: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpeter was vnskillfully founded by a Greek in the Theater: which helped the suspicion, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to spoile the Towne; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Hauē; whence hee might easily perceiue the next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gaue them to vnderstand, what good affection hee bore them; inuighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors; and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done; and hauing gotten such spoile as was to bee had of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, He addrest himselfe against the Citadell; hoping that if the Garrison would fallie out, he might giue them such a blow, as should make them vnable to defend the Pecee. According to his expectation it partly fel out. For when hee beganne to make his approaches, the Romans in a brauerie sallying forth, gaue charge vpon his men: who fell back of purpose according to direction, till they had drawne on as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gaue Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared readie for the purpose: and fiercely setting vpon the Enemy, draue him back with great slaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that afterwards he durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood vpon a Demi-land, that was plaine ground; and fortified only with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was joyned by a cawley. This cawley Hannibal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadell; to the end that the Tarentines might bee able, without his helpe, to keepe themselves from all danger thence. His worke in few daies went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceiued hope of winning the Pecee it selfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherefore he made readie all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was busied in his works, there came by Sea a strong supply from Metapontum: which tooke away all hope of preuailling; and made him returne to his former counsaile. Now so farre as the Tarentine fleet lay within the Hauē, and could not passe forth. Whilest the Romans held the Citadell: it seemed likely, that the Towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea; whilest the Roman Garrison, by helpe of their shipping, might easily be relieved, lieued; and enabled to hold out. Against this inconuenience; it was rather withed by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the Hauē; to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streets being faire and broad, it would bee no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer Land, and launch them into the Sea without. This he vnderooke and effected: whereby the Roman Garrison was reduced into great necessitie; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires required.

- Thus, with mutual losse on both sides, the time passed: and the Roman forces, growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Placcus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hastic growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, whereinto the loss of Canusium had reduced them. But to fill vp these Legions, they were faine to take vp young Boyes, that were vnder seuen teene yeeres of age; and to send Commissioners about fiftie miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might appeare seruiciable, & pressing them to the warres; making yet a Law, That their yeares of seruice, whereinto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had beene of lawfull age. Before the Roman Armie drew neere, the Campans felt great want of victuall, as if they had already beene besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoile, which the Romans had in foregoing yeeres made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadors to Hannibal; desiring him to succour them ere they were sent vp, as they feared to bee shortly. Hee gaue them comfortable words: and closed Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; against which they should be readie with all manner of Carriages, to store themselves with victuall, that he would provide. Neither did he promise more, than he performed. For hee caused great quantitie of graine, that had beene laid vp in Cities round about; to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither at the time appointed came no more than fortie Carts or Wagons, with a few pack-horses; as if this had beene enough to victualle Capua. Such was the rechelesse of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angrie hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts; since hunger could not teach them to haue greater care. Wherefore hee gaue them a longer day; against which hee made prouision to store them thoroughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Consul, taking with him such strength as hee thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneuentum by night; where with diligence hee made inquirie into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions; that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe; so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great Harass. Hereupon the Consul bade his men prepare themselves, to assault the Enemies campe: and leaving all his impediments within Beneuentum, He marched thitherward so early in the morning, that hee was there with the first breake of day. By coming so vnexpected, Hee had well-neere forced the campe on the sudden. But it was very strong, and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the lesse desire had Fulvius to loose more of his men in the attempt; seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke; to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of their Armie, and to lie betwene Hanno and home; that neither the Campans should depart thence, nor the Carthaginian be able to relieue them. Being thus discouraging, and about to found the retreat; hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart.

Thera

There was great bootie; or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vntlesse they would endure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominie, than which none could bee greater, made the Souldiers aduenture so desperately; that Fulvius, perceiuing the heat of his men, charged purpose, and encouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had already gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the campe was wonne: in which were flaine aboue like thousand; and taken, about seuen thousand, besides all the fore of vistsuables, and carriages, with abundance of bootie, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misadventure, and the neerer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that he was wont to protest vnto their Citie; and how he had made hew, to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Asp was lately, if he gaue not strong and speedie succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keepe their grounds from spoile; whilest hee himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many townes adjoining, to yeeld vnto him. Among the Holiages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt; were some of the Metapontines, and other Citie of the Greekes, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italie, which was called of old Magna Græcia. These people tooke to heart the death of their Holiages; and thought the punishment greater, than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soone as the Roman Garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadell of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would haue done the like, vpon the like reason: had not some companies laine in their Towne; which they feared that they should not be able to master. Neuertheless they helped themselves by cunning; inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neere at hand: against whom whilest they professed their seruice to Atinius, the Roman captaine, they drew him forth to fight; and recoyling from him, closed vp their gates. A little formalitie they vsed in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should breake in together with the Romans; in sauing Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practice) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this disputation lasted not long; for they that had removed the chiefe impediment, easily preuailed in the rest; and deliuered vp the Towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters; whilest the Consuls, fortifying Beneuentum to secure their backs, addressed themselves vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprize. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late bene twice Consul, was flaine either by trecherie of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush; or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His bodie, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himselfe, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal lent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneuentum, there to secure the back of the Armie that should besiege Capua. But his death happened in an ill time; to the great hindrance of that businesse. The Volturnes, or Slauis lately manumitted, forsooke their Ensignes, and went euery one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leaders; so that it asked some labour to seeke them out, and bring them back into their campe. Neuertheless the Consuls went forward with their worke; and drawing neere to Capua, did all acts of hostilitie which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome; wherein aboue fifteene hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long, ere Hannibal came thither: who fought with the Consuls, and

and had the better; in so much that hee caused them to dislodge. They removed by night, and went severall waies: Fulvius toward Cume; Claudius, into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius: who hauing led him a great walke, fetched a compasse about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one M. Centurius Penela, a stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Armie not farre from thence, where Hannibal rested, when hee was wearie of hunting after Claudius. This Penela had made great waies to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trusted with the leading of five thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reject the vertue of any good Souldier; how meane so euer his condition were. Wherefore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand: and he himselfe, being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered vp so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue prooffe of the difference, betweene a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. Hee and his fellows were all (in a manner) flaine; scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this Hannibal had word, that Ch. Fulvius, a Roman Pretor, with eightene thousand men, was in Apulia; very careless, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither hee therefore hastied, to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should haue cut off those forces, that lay in the Prouinces at out, vnder men of small abilitie. Coming vpon Fulvius, He found him and his men so jolly, that needs they would haue fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So hee bestowed M. 20 with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offering battaile to Fulvius, Hee loonce had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape aliue; leaving all, saue two thousand of his followers, dead behinde him.

These two great blowes, received one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neuertheless all care was taken, to gather vp the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls (should go substantially forwards with the siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls late downe before the towne; and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Pretors, came with his Armie from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoever would iussue forth of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should haue his pardon, and bee suffered to enjoy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously rejected; the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succors attended from Hannibal. Before the Citie was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginians; which found him at Brundisium. He had made a long journey, in hope of gaining the Tarentine citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundisium; vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him; told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as braue recomforted. He bade them consider, how a few daies since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would presently come thither againe, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answere the Messengers returned: and hardly could get back into the citie; which the Romans had almost entrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe; He was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time: and thereby giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italie; whilst the Roman armie spent it selfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingered: and thereby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselves at Capua, and to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whilest he himselfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of Office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua; retaining the same Armies, as Proconsuls. The townemen men often fallied out: rather in a brauerie, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect; the Enemie lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horle (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans vsed to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirnish. In these exercises the *Campan*s vsually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemie; who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some aduise and courageous yong men, should learne to ride beinde the Roman men at armes; leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thick vpon the Enemies horle, whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartened in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the Citie; Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans; and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their campe. At the same time the Capuans illused with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuise: setting all their multitude of vniuersible people on the walls; which, with a loud noise of Pannes and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the *Campan*s, easily defended his Trenches against them; and so well repressed them, that he draue them at length back into their Citie. Neuertheless, in pursuing them to their gates. He receiued a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Q. Fuluius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian Armie. The Roman campe was euen at point to haue bene lost: and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought with him three and thirtie, were either gotten within the rampart, or else (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch; and filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine well, to proclaime aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That euery one of the Souldiers should thirst for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next Hills, forasmuch as the campe was already lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Armie, hauing sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly entrenched it selfe; so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it selfe: and now his desire of winning the Tarentine Citadell, had well-neere lost Capua; in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor Citie of Tarentum, were to haue bene much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vse: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, euen to set vpon Rome; and carrie to the wallies of that proud Citie, the danger of warre that threatened Capua. This hee thought would bee a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Armie; then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces; then was it likely, that either he, or the *Campan*s, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did hee despair, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the Citie. His onely feare was, lest the *Campan*s, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themselves to the Enemie. To prevent this danger, He sent letters to Capua by a subtilie Nimidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman campe, conueighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The iourne to Rome, was to be performed with great celeritie: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddennesse of his arriual there. Wherefore hee caused his men, to haue in a readinesse ten daies victualles; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the Riuer of Vulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but

That the Roman Generals by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate which was there with affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsaile to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather then to put the Towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the Enemie. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondered how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the Citie, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence; if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that letters should be sent to Fuluius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to doe as they thought behouefull: and if it might conueniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the Citie of Rome into much aduantage. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fuluius tooke fiftene thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choise of his whole Armie: with which he halted toward Rome; leauing App. Claudius, who could not trauel by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua. Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Vulturnus, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might serue to transport the Enemie, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then halted he away toward Rome; staying no longer in any one place, then hee needs must. Yet found he the bridges ouer Liris broken downe, by the people of Fregella: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grieuouly to spoile their lands, whiles the bridges were in mending. The neerer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his *Nimidian*s running before him; driving the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their owne feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pelted with women, crying and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Assembly; ready to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions giuen by the Magistrates. All places of moit importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the middle of this trepidation, there came newes that Q. Fuluius, with part of the Armie from Capua, was halting to defence of the Citie. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entrie into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fuluius might lose nothing by coming into the Citie in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should haue equall power with the Consuls, during his abode there. Hee and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one soone after another: Fuluius hauing bene long held occupied in passing ouer Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Countrey was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fuluius, incamped without the Gates of Rome; attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew neerer and greater; so tooke they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he aduanced with two thousand Horse, and rode along a great way vnder the wals; viewing the site thereof, and considering how he might best approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Storie saith) was driven away; without doing, or receiuing any hurt. Many tumults rose in this while among the people; but were suppressed by the diligence of the Senators. Above the rest one accident was both troublesome, and not without perill. Of *Nimidian*s that had shifted side, and fallen vpon

some displeasures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were some twelve hundred then in Rome; which were appointed by the Consuls, to passe through the Towne, from the Mount Aventine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their service might be usefull among broken wayes, and Garden wals lying in the suburbs. The faces of these men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal, bred such mistaking, as caused a great uproare among the people: all crying out, that Aventine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the wals. The noise was such, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the freets were so full of cattraile, and husbandmen, which were fledde thither out of the Villages adioyning, that the passage was stopp'd vp: and the poore Numidians pitifully beaten from the house-toppes, with stones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the desperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not bene certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedie the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had bene Dictators, Consuls, or Censors, should haue authority as Magistrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following, Hannibal passed ouer Amien, and presented battaile to the Romans, who did not wisely if they vnderooke it. It is said, that a terrible shewre of raine, caused both Romans & Carthaginians to returne into their severall Camps: and that this happened two daies together, the weather breaking vp, and clearing, as soone as they were departed asunder. Certaine it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more then ten daies prouision, could not endure to stay there, vntill his victuals were all spent. In which regard, the Romans, if they suffered him to waste his time and prouisions, knowing that hee could not abide there long, did as became well-aduised men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is said) by some accident of weather; the commendations must be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals comming to the Citie, how great soeuer it was at the first, yet after some leisuere, and better notice taken of his forces, which appeared lesse than the first apprehension had formed them, was much and soone abated. Hereunto it helped well, that at the same time, the supplie appointed for Spaine, after the death of the two Scipio's, was sent out of the towne, & went forth at one gate, whilst the Carthaginian lay before another. In all Panick terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cause known or no cause answerable to the greatnesse of the sudden consternation; it is a good remedie to doe somewhat quite contrarie to that which the danger would require, were it such, as men haue falslied in in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cause his souldiers to disarme themselves, when they were all on a sudden in a great feare of they knew not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a foolish vprore in his Army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tel who had sent the Asse into the Campe. But in this present example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimitie: whereby they sustained their reputation, and augmented it no lesse, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might seeme to haue bene diminished. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceits of their Enemies, and taken away the disgrace of that feare, which clouded their valour at his first comming; than by making such demonstrations, when once they had recouered spirit, how little they esteemed him. To this purpose therefore that verie piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, was sold in Rome: and sold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. His indignity comming to his care, incensed Hannibal so much, that he made Port-fals of the Siluer-smiths shops, which were neere about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his owne title to the Houses within the Towne, were no whit worse, then any Roman Citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, wheron he raised his Tent. But this counter-practice was nothing worth. The Romans did seek to manifest that assurance, which they iustly had conceiued, Hannibal, to make the continuing in an hope, which was already past. His victuals were almost spent, and of those ends, that he had propofed vnto himselfe, this iourney had brog forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore hee brake vp his campe: and doing what spoile he could in the Roman Territories, without sparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, He passed like a Tempest ouer the Countrey; and ranne toward the Easterne Sea so fast, that hee had almost taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arrivall was feared or suspected. As for Capua, hee gaue it lost: and is likely to haue curst the whole faction of Hanno, which thus disabled him to relieue that faire Citie; since he had no other way to vent his griefe.

Q. Fulvius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that who so would yeild, before a certaine day, might safely doe it. This, and the very returne of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderstand, that they were abandoned, and their case desperate. To truit the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conscience of his owne euill deserts, told him, that it was a vanitie: and some faint hope was given, by Hanno and Bostar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garrison within the Towne; that Hannibal should come againe; if it means could onely be found, how to conuey such letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the letters was vnderaken, by some Numidians: who running, as fugitives, out of the Towne, into the Roman campe, waited it opportunitee to make an escape thence with their packets. But it hapned, ere they could conueigh themselves away, that one of them was detected by an Harlot following him out of the Towne; and the letters of Bostar and Hanno were taken and opened; containing a vehement entreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus forsake the Capuans and them. For (said they) we came not hither to make warre against Rhegium and Tarentum, but against the Romans: whose Legions wheresoever they lie, there also should the Carthaginian Armie be readie to attend them; and by taking of such course, haue wee gotten those victories at Trubin, Thrasymene, and Canna. In fine, they besought him, that he would not dishonour himselfe and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie should not be taken in his full view: promising, to make a desperate fallie, if he would once more adventure to set vpon the Roman campe. Such were the hopes of Bostar and his fellow. But Hannibal had already done his best: and now began to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he protested) he was vanquished by Hanno and his Partisans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like cases, that some of those which were besieged in Capua, had bene sent out by the Hannonians, to observe the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were so; iustly might they curse their owne malice, which had cast them into this remedielesse necessitie. Howsoever it were, the letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is shewed) into the Roman Proconsuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all such counterfait fugitives, as carried such messages, whipt them backe into the Towne. This miserable spectacle brake the hearts of the Capuans: so that the Multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, caused them to assemble, and consult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The brauest of the Senators, and such as a few yeeres since had bene most forward in joyning with Hannibal, understood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the rest home to supper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drink to them such an health, as should set them free from that cruel reuenge, which the Enemy sought vpon their bodies. About seven and twentie of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poyson. All the rest, hoping for more mercie than they had deserved, yeelded simply to discretion. So one of the Towne-gates was set open: whereat a Roman Legion with some other companies, entring, disarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garrison; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe. At their comming thither, the Proconsuls laid yrons vpon them all: and commanding them to tell what store of gold and siluer they had at home, sent them into safe custody;

custodie; some to Cales; others to Theanum. Touching the generall Multitude; they were referred vnto the discretion of the Senate: yet so hardly vsed by Fulvius in the meane while, that they had little cause of hope or comfort in this aduersitie. Sp. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately receiued: yet was he not inexorable to the Campanians; as hauing loved them well in former times, and hauing giuen his daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom we spake before. But this facilitie of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more hallic in taking vengeance: for feare, lest vpon the like respects, the Roman Senate might proue more gentle, than he thought behouful to the common safetie, and honour of their state. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theanum, and from thence to Cales: where he caused all the Campan prisoners to suffer death; binding them to stakes, and scourging them first a good while with rods; after which he struck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Townes of Italie the lesse apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campanians; and bred a generall inclination, to returne vpon good conditions to the Roman side. The Atellans, Calstines, and Sabartines, people of the Campanians, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made also now the like submission, for very feare, and want of abilitie to resist. They were therefore vsed with the like rigour, by Fulvius: who dealt so extremely with them all, that he brought them into desperation. Wherefore some of their yong Gentlemen, burning with fire of reuenge, got into Rome: where they found means by night-time, to set on fire so many houses, that a great part of the Citie was like to haue been consumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no casualitie. Wherefore libertie was proclaimed vnto any slaue, and other sufficient reward vnto any free man, that should discouer who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out: and the Campanians, being detected by a slaue of their owne (to whom, about his libertie promised, was giuen about the summe of an hundred markes) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their walls: and this extreme severity, caused them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set vnto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Onely two poore women in Capua (of which one had beene an Harlot) were found not guiltie of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wiues and children sold for slaues, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and referred to further deliueration: but the generalitie of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day; and confined vnto severall places as best liked the angrie Victors. As for the Towne of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beautie and commodious site: but no corporation or forme of politic, was allowed to bee therein; onely a Roman Prouost was euery yeere sent to gouerne ouer those that should inhabit it, and to doe iustice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present warre. After this, the glorie of Hannibal beganne to shine with a more dimme light, than before: his oyle being farre spent; and that, which should haue renewed his flame, being vnfortunatly shed; as shall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicill, held warre against the Romans in those Ilands; and were ouercome.

Hilest things passed thus in Italie; the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicill by the Carthaginians & their friends, were brought to a quiet and happie end, by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: about thirtie thousand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harfcoras with his sonne Hioitus, mightie men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his Countre. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so carelesse, as in the rest of their maine vndertakings, about the same time. Yet it had beene better, if their care had beene directed vnto the prosecution of that maine businesse in Italie; wherein this and all other hopes depended. For it would haue sufficed, if they could haue hindered the Romans from sending an Armie into Sardinia. Harfcoras with his followers might well enough haue serued to driue out Q. Mutius the Prator; who lay sicke in the Province; and not more weake in his owne bodie, than in his traine. But whilest they sought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the sense was most grievous: they neglected the opportunitie of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such; as may seeme to haue discouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent over Afarubal, surnamed the bald, with a competent fleet and armie; assisted in this Expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, & by Margo a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremitie of foule weather, was cast vpon the Baleares; so beaten and in such quill plight, that the Sardinians had euen spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twentie thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preferre and vp-hold in their seuerall Provinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Province had beene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincials; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatsoeuer accident required the assistance of a Patron: the first Conquerour, and his race assisted him, were the most readie and best approued means, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very great intelligence, in euery Province, and had alwaies in readinesse fit men to reclaim their Subiects; if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harfcoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twentie thousand, whereof we haue spoken before. He landed at Calaris or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countre, and fought out the Enemie. Hyoitus, the sonne of Harfcoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Armie left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countre, to draw in more friends to their side. This yong Gentleman would needes aduenture to get honor, by giuing battaile to the Romans at his owne discretion. So hee rashly aduentured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom he receiued a terrible overthrow; and lost in one day about thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyoitus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troups, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeat came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as he might have done, it the tempest had not hindered his voiage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to save the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon with-drew himselfe backe to Calaris: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman partie) craued his assistance; their Countie being wasted by the Carthaginians; and the Rebels, with whom they had refused to ioyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if he had staid a little longer, Asdrubal would have sought him out with some blemish to his reputation. 10 But the fame of Asdrubal and his companie, appears to have beene greater than was their strength. For after some triall made of them in a few skirmishes; Manlius adventured all to the hazard of a battaile: wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thousand. Four houres the battaile lasted: and victorious length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders; whose courages had bene broken in their vnprosperous fight, nor many daies before. The death of young Hyslas, and of his father Hyscoras, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuitie of Asdrubal himselfe, with Idago and Hanno the Carthaginians; made the victorie the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus: whither Manlius followed them; and in short space wanne 20 the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had imposed vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best forced with the nature of their several offences, or their ability to pay, returned backe to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome; leauing Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicil was of greater length, and euery way more burdnesome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit; for that the Romans became thereby not only sauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countie; by annexing the Citie and Dominion of Syracuse; so that which they enjoyed before. Soone after the battaile of Canne, the old King of Syracuse died: who 30 had continued long a stedfast friend vnto the Romans; and greatly relieued them in this present warre. He left his Kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeeres of age; Gelo his sonne, that should haue bene his heire, being dead before. To this young King his successor, Hiero appointed fifteene tutors: of which the principal were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themistius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The rest were such, as he iudged most likely to preferre the Kingdome, by the same arte, whereby himselfe had gotten and so long kept it. But within a little while; Andronodorus, waxing wearie of so many Coad- 40 tutors, beganne to commend the sufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeeres; and said, that he was able to rule the Kingdome without helpe of any Protector. Thus by giuing over his owne charge, hee caused others to doe the like: hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to passe in a sort as he desired. For Hieronymus, laying aside all care of gouernement, gaue himselfe wholly over to his pleasures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was onely in matter of exterior shew, as wearing a Diademe with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people; that had neuer seene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his sonne. But much more he offended them, when by his insolent behauiour, futable to his outward pompe, he gaue proofe, that, in course of life, hee would reuiue the memorie of Tyrants dead long since, from whom he tooke the pattenne of his habit. Hee grew proud, 50 lustfull, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him: so that such of his late Tutors as could escape him by flight, were glad to liue in banishment: the rest, being most of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to avoid the danger of his displeasure, that seemed worse than death it selfe.

Only

Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thrafo continued in grace with him, and were his Counsaillers, but not of his Cabinet. These, howeuer they agreed in other points, were at some dissension about that maine point, of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleasures, which was set on change: but Thrafo, hauing more regard of his honour and profit, was very earnest to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilest as yet it remained somewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline: a conspiracie against his Person, was detected by a groom of his; to whom, one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; 10 thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the vnder-takers. Long it was ere he would speake any thing: but yeelding (as it seemed) in the end, vnto the extremitie of the torture, he confessed, that he had bene set on by Thrafo, whom he appeached of the treason, together with many more, that were necere in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All these therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime where with they were charged. But they that were indeede the Conspirators, walked boldly in the streets, and neuer shrunke for the matter: assuring themselves, that their resolution of Theodorus would yeelde to no extremitie; Thus they all escaped, and soone after found means to execute their purpose. The King himselfe, when Thrafo was taken out of the way, quickly resolved vpon siding 20 with the Carthaginians; whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when first they grow Masters of themselves, loue to seeme wiser than their fathers, by taking different courses. And the liberalitie of Hiero to the Romans, in their great necessitie, had of late bene such, as might haue bene termed excessiue; were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein hee tooke order for his owne estate, that depended vpon theirs. But the young Nephew, taking little heede of dangers farre off, regarded only the things present; the weakenesse of Rome; the preualent fortunes of Carthage; and the much monie that his grand-father had laied out in vaine, to shoulder vp a falling house. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correspondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates & Eptides, 30 Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a banished Syracusen. These grew into such fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they listed. So that when Appius Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion offering the Confederacie, betwene the People of Rome and the King of Syracuse; his Messengers were dismissed with an open scoffe. For Hieronymus would needs haue them tell him the order of the fight at Canne; that hee might thereby learne how to accomodate himselfe: saying, That he could hardly beleue the Carthaginians; so wonderfull was the victorie as they reported it. Having thus dismissed the Romans, he sent Embassadors to Carthage, where hee concluded a league: with condition, at first, that a great part of the Island should be annexed to his Domini- 40 on; but afterward, that he should raigne ouer all Sicil; and the Carthaginians rest satisfied, with what they could get in Italie. At these doings Appius Claudius did not greatly stirre: partly for the indignities that were offered, partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, then were enforced vpon them by necessity; and partly (as may seeme) for that the reputation, both of himselfe, and of his Citie, had receiued such blemish, by that which hapned vnto him in his iourne, as much discontented him when he came into Sicil, & forbade him to looke big. The money that Hiero had bestowed vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their necessitie, this Appius was to carrie backe vnto him: it being refused by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their present fortune would allow. But 50 in stead of returning the monie with thanks, as he had bene directed, and as it had bene noised abroad that hee should doe: the warre against Philip King of Macedon (whereof we haue spoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aside their vaine glory, and send word after him, that he should consign that monie over to Marcus Valerius; of whose voyagge into Greece, the Citie had not otherwise wherewith to beare bear the charge. This was done accordingly: and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious ostentation of the Roman magnanimitie; into such a pittifull tune of thanksgiving, as must needs haue bred sorrow and commiseration, in so true a friend as Hiero; or, if he were deluded after his death, matter of pastime and scorn, in Hieronimus the new King.

But whilst Hieronimus was more desirous of warre, than well resolved how to beginne it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innovation in the state of Syracuse; which thereby might haue prospered more than euer, had it bene wisely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we spake before, were sent about the Country with two thousand men; to sollicite the Townes, and perswade them to shake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himselfe with an Armie of fiftene thousand horse and foot, went to Leontium, a Citie of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Island fall to him in all haste, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conspirators tooke him on the sudden, as hee was passing through a narrow street; and rushing betwene him and his guard, strooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the sound of that word so joyfully answered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronimus, had little courage to reuenge their Masters death. Yet for feare of the worst, a great largesse was promised vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought so effectually; that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp; the Armie, as in detestation of his bad life, suffered his carcase to lie vnburied. These newes ranne quickly to Syracuse: whither some of the Conspirators, taking the Kings horses, poiled away; to signifie all that had passed; to stirre vp the people to libertie; and to prevent Andronodorus, if he, or his fellows would make offer to vsurpe a Tyrannie. The Syracusians herupon presently tooke Armes; and made themselves masters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other side fortified the Palace, and the Island: being yet vncertaine what to doe; betwene desire of making himselfe a soueraigne Lord, and feare of suffering punishment, as a Tyrant, if his enterprise miscarried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cherished him in his hopes; putting him in minde of that well knowne Proverbe, which Dionysius had vsed; That a Tyrant should keepe his place, till he were haled out of it by the beeles, and not ride away from it on horse-backe. But feare, and better counsaile preuailed so farre; that Andronodorus, hauing slept vpon the matter; dissembled his affections, and deferred his hope, vnto better opportunitie. The next day he came forth, and made a speech vnto the People: telling them; That hee was glad to see, how prudently they behaued themselves in so great a change; that he had stood in feare, lest they would not haue contained themselves within bounds of discretion; but rather haue fought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that since he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to rauish their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his strength, & surrendered vp the charge, committed vnto him, by one that had bene an euill Master, both to him and them. Herupon great joy was made; and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie; of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraignitie; and so vehement were the insligations of his wife; that shortly he beganne to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercinaries: hoping to make himselfe strong, by their helpe; that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had bene with the Syracusian Pretors, and told them, that, being sent from Hannibal to Hieronimus, they according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whilst he liued, what seruite they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed: and with a conuoy; that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily easily granted; both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earne thanks of Hannibal, with such a little curtelie; and for that they thought it good content, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublefome couple; which were good souldiers, and gracious with the Armie, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Sicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew: they were more mindefull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they infused themselves into the bosoms of such as were most likely to fill the army with tumult: especially of the Roman fugitiues, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselves, when the Romans & Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great neede of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Harmonia the sister of Hieronimus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents; he reuealed the matter to one, that reuealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entering into the Senate, were slaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whilst Hieronimus liued, as by his authoritie; and now since attempted, in seeking to vsurpe the tyrannie themselves. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessarie to this dangerous treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recovered those Royall ornaments, and Soueraigne power, whereof their familie was now dispossessed. These daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were also condemned to die: & executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liues. Demarata, and Harmonia had perhaps deferred this heauie sentence: but Helices, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sossippus, being altogether innocent; was murdered together with her two yong daughters, in the hasty execution of this rash judgement. Her husband Sossippus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronimus, that being sent Embassador to King Ptoleme, &c. he durst not returne home; but staid in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some other pittifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardoning themselves) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule a butchery. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not other wise how to satisfie their anger; they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Pretors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing striven in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicily; they gave way vnto the time, and of the old league of Hiero to be reconfirmed; which afterward they purposed to dissolve by practice. The Leontines had some neede of a Garrison: and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor, attended, by such fugitiues, and mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, hee beganne to doe many acts of hostilitie against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two bretheren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of bretheren were expelled the Island, Epicides, feare to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to see forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace; went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians.

Syracusans. For he said, that since they had all of late serued one Master; there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusans; yea or much rather, all things considered; since in their Arrets the Tyrant was slaine, and libertie first proclaimed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented, to enjoy the freedome purchased among the Leontines; but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion ouer those that had broken the chaine, wherewith both the one, and the other were bound: his aduice was, that such their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was giuen by one article of the league, made of late by the Romans and Syracusans. For it was agreed, That all which had been subiect to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be subiect unto the state of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicles told them, that in this nonclicke of change, they had fit opportunity to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke libertie from the Syracusans. But seeing they had long since yielded vnto Syracuse, and been subiect vnto that Citie, by what forme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of libertie was rather reasonable than iust. Neuerthelesse the motion of Epicles was highly approved: in so much that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans; and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicles, that they should get them gone, either to Leontis, or whither else they listed, so that they staid not in Sicily: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusans, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselves bound to obserue the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptorie answer was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusans: who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition that when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with toke the businesse in hand; which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken: all saue the Castle, wherinto Hippocrates and Epicles fled; and stealing thence away by night, conueied themselves into the Towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Capitaines vsed after victorie; to seeke out the fugitiue Roman slaues and renegados, whom hee caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, hee tooke to mercy; forbearing also to strip or spoile them. But the fame of his doings was bruted after a contrary sort. It was said, that he had slaine, Man, Woman, and Child, and put the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusan Army vpon the way, as it was going to ioine with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had bene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Sofis and Dinaemenes two of the Pretors, to serue against the Leontines and other Rebels. These Capitaines were honest men, and well affected to their Countrey: but the souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They tooke the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had bene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutinie; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Pretors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and set them a worke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no neede of their seruice. So toward Herbesus they marched: where lay Hippocrates and Epicles, the architects of all this mischiefe, deuiling what further harme they might doe; but now so weakely accompanied, that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware; and therefore aduentured vpon a remedy little lesse desperate desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus vnarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of suppliants; and so presented themselves to the Armie. Sixe hundred men of Creete were in the vanguard; that had bin well viced by Hieronymus; and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and louingly dismissed them. These Cretans therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare; saying, that no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vie their weapons. Herewithall the Armie was at a stand; and the rumor of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by feueritie; which would not serue. For when they commanded these two Traitors to be laid in yrons: the exclamation was so violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, vncertaine what courie to take, vnto Megara; where they were lodged the night before. Tither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a trick; whereby to helpe himselfe, and better the vncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretans; directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusan Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the Mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensive, all of them in general, to the libertie of the Citie, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed: the vprore was such, that Sofis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the campe, and flie for their liues. All the Syracusans; remaining behinde, had been cut in peeces by the enraged souldiers, if the two artificers of the sedition had not saued their liues; rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne; than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had serued among the Leontines, to iustifie the bruit of Marcellus his crueltie; and to carrie home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witnesse. This incensed not only the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole Towne with caulcelle indignation. In good time (said some) was the auarice and crueltie of the Romans detected: who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse; where their liue in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse; where their greedy appetites might haue bene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilst they were thus discourting, and deuiling how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Armie came to the gates; exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnlesse for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of those within the Towne; that laboured to breake it open. So he entred, and immediately fell vpon the Pretors; whom (being forsaken by all men) hee put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day he went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue liberty to all slaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and basest sort, made himselfe and his other Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadors to Syracuse; that were not admitted into the Haven, but chased out as enemies. Then drew hee neere with his Armie; and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the Towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to doe hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusans, which were oppressed by Tyrants; and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and

enjoy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might be deliuered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, That if their errand had bene to him, he could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the gouernement in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned; hee told them, they should finde by experience, that to besiege Syracuse, was an other manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee sent them gone; and returned back into the Citie. Immediately beganne the sieg, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quicke and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of walls, as compassed Syracuse, being manned with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately dealt, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his best, both by Land and Sea. Neuerthelſe all his labour was disappointed; and his hope of preuailling by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despair of hastie victorie. But there liued at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes, the noble Mathematician; who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischief to the Romans than could haue bene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder; had they in that age bene knowne. This Archimedes discourſing once with Hiero, maintained, That it were possible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of fure footing, whereon a man might stand. For prooffe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes; which made the King entreat him to conuert his studie vnto things of vse; that might preferre the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an inuarie done vnto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workmanship, and gaine, of base handicrafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians; that seemed vnto him to profane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither muſt wee rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious auſteritie, or affected singularitie in his reprehension. For it hath bene the vnhappy fate of great inuentions, to be viſified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued; as falling within compass of the meanest wit; and things, that euery one, could well haue performed. Hercof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which hee vnder-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparent prooffe. He that looks vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade; will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an inuention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuention any whit the lesse, for that the labor of workmanship growes to be the Trade of ignorant men. The like may be said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes; which being deuised, and bettered, by great Schoſers and wise men, grew after ward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell; that is, by such, as could slubber things easily ouer, and feede their workmen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankind; are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of iniustice, that the long trauels of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth; or yeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meer strangers; and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as hauing Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such cases as this; and serueth against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, where-with God hath denied to endue them. Neuerthelſe, if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection, that euery one ought to beare vnto the generalitie of mankind, after the example of him that suffereth his Sonne to liue vpon the iſt and vniuersall: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselves, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lie buried in their own bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning; that may bee peruenied by cuill men to a mischieuous vse. For if the secret of any rare Art, should contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irrecoverable poyſon: better it were, that such a iewel remaine close in the hands of a wife and honest man; than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischief. But the workes which Archimedes published, were such as tended to very commendable ends. They were engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse; not fit for the Syracusans to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vse them, but referred so much to his owne direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that he had approued, euen vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science; and done especiall benefit vnto his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastened together, and Towers erected on them, to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these, Archimedes had sundrie deuices; of which any one fort might haue repelled the assaults: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He thot heauie stones and long peeces of timber, like vnto the yards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall voly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoisted vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange engines were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls, or cast vpon the rocks: and all of them were so beaten, that they durst neuer come to any second assault. In like sort was the Land-armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like Haile; did not onely ouerwhelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assault. For remedie herof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could earlie before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blank, and receiue no hurt by these terrible Intriments; which were wound vp hard to shoote a great compass. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaultants liues. For the shot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to stay by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans; that if they perceived any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare; against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood vpon the walls, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without; he might haue holpen it by some deuice, to make them vnreceivable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streets behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vse them. Wherefore the Roman had none other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouision of victualls, both by Land and by Sea. This was a desperate peece of worke.

For

For the enemies hauing so goodly an Haue; the Scain amanner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely, so soone to bee confumed with famine, as the besiegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a Citie, hauing no probability to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicily, being by Hippocrates aduertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there to deale with the Senate, that five and twentie thousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicily by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many, that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. Hee tooke Pelorus and Herbesus, which yeelded vnto him. Hee tooke also Megara by force and fact: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracussans, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie much haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue saued Agrigentum: whether hee came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse, carefully, and in as good order as hee could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumstance that hee liued, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, intending to ioyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victory, against the disperfed and halfe vnarmed Syracussans. The reputation hereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer al the Island at his pleasure, and presented battle to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Haue of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arriued at Marcellus his campe; yet many places reuolted vnto the Carthaginians, and sue or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath awhile; and Marcellus leauing some of his Armie before Syracuse, that he might not seeme to haue giuen over the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intentione to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious worke of besieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnable to preuaile; and he himselfe was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not faillible, an enterprise, that he had once taken in hand. Hee came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially hee assaied to preuaile by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracussan Gentlemen that were in his campe, exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the towne would harken to no parlee. At length a slave vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse, where where he talked in priuate with some few, as he had beene instructed. Thus began Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vied to send him aduertisement of their proceedings; by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance: all was discovered; and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damippus a Lacedaemonian, that had beene sent out of the Towne as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicles was very desirous to ransom him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not farre from the walls.

There, one of the Romans, looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious arte of Geometric, fell to numbring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, iudged it lesse than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith hee acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it; made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakest part of the Towne, and therefore the most strongly garded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surpris. But a fugitive out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three dayes: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicles, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not be wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festiual night, came vnto the walls, which hee tooke by Scalado, Syracuse was diuided into foure parts (or five, if Epitola were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peeces, he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradinia and the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that beganne to harken vnto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans had taken and fact. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those, that were sheltered vnder strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner walls were not altogether vnurnished of his helpe; since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives, and Renegados, were more carefull than euer to defend the rest of the Citie: being sure to be rewarded with a cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was sent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence: It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell vpon the old camp of the Romans, whilst Epicles sallied out of Acradinia vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made such defence in each part, that the Assailants were repelled. Neuertheless, they continued to beset Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as strictly besieged, as he himselfe did besiege the Towne. But the pestilence at length consumed; together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and caused the rest to dislodge. The Romans were (though somewhat lesse) afflicted with the same pestilence, in so much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were sent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no desire to doe his Countrey seruice: but his courage was not answerable to his good will. He arriued at Pachynus with a strong fleet: where he staid; being loth to double the Cape; for that the windes did better serue the enemy than him. Thither sailed Epicles out of Syracuse: to acquaint him with the necessities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length hee came forward; but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was ready for him, he stood off into the deepe; and sailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicily farewell. Then durst not Epicles returne into Syracuse, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the issue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

T he Sicilian souldiers, that remained aliue of Hippocrates his Armie, lay as nere as they could faile, vnto Marcellus and fene of them, in a strong Towne three miles off. Thefe had done what good they could to Syracuse, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the state of Sicily was giuen as desperate by the Carthaginians: they sent Embassadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themselves, and for the Towne. Hercunto Marcellus willingly gaue care: for he had baid there long enough; and had caufe to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither strong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers, that lay abroad; That they should be Masters of their owne, enioying their libertie and proper lawes, yet fulfilling the Romans to possesse, what euer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors choien; and the gates euen readie to be opened vnto Marcellus: when suddenly the Roman fugitiues disturbed all. Thefe perceiving their owne condition to be desperate, perswaded the other Mercinarie souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themselves, and betrayed the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they presently tooke armes, and fell vpon the new-chofen Pretors: whom they flue; and made election of fixe Capitaines that should command ouer all. But shortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the souldiers; excepting onely the Fugitiues. T he treatie therfore was againe set on foot, and wanted little of conclusion: which yet was delayed; either by some feare of the Citizens, that had fene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman auarice in the sack of Epipolæ, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts alreadie taken; or by some desire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vie the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly subiect vnto Rome. Mercius a Spaniard was one of the fixe Capitaines, that had bene chofen in the late commotion: a man of such faith, as usually is found in Mercinaries; holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other respects. With this Capitaine, Marcellus dealt secretly: having a fit instrument, of the same Nation, one Belligenes; that went in company with the Roman Embassadors, daily passing to and fro. This craftie Agent perswaded Mercius, That the Romans had alreadie gotten all Spain; and that euer he purposed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where else; it was now the onely time to doe it; by conforming himselfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By such hopes the Spanish Capitaine was easily wonne, and sent forth his owne brother among the Syracusan Embassadors to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus against the Syracuzians, cannot well be commended as honest : neither was it afterwards thoroughly approued at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had bene such, as deserved not to be requir'd with the ruine of his Countrie : much lesse, that the miseries of his people, oppressed (though partly through their owne follie, by an Arme of Mercina- 40 rians, should minister vnto the people of Rome, advantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Arme. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicles : it had bene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicles his followers; and many of them selues had also bin slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rafalcites, and some ill aduised Persons ioyned with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaughter which they 50 heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken ? Ought therefore the Roman General, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracuzians, to make a bargain vnder-hand against them, with a Capitaine of the Mercinaries ? These things were objected against Marcellus, at his returne turne home. But the Senators thought it a great deal better, to comfort the Syracians with gentle words, and promises of good viages in time to come, than to reflect the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citee, to great, wealthy, strong, and many waies important. Neurtherleffe if we consider the many incontinencie, and great mischiefs, wherunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by cuill neighbors, and by that very forme of politie, after which it was gouerned: wee may truly al-firm, that it receiued no small benefit, by becoming subiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not only assured against all forraigne enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of old had ragin'd therein: but freed from the necessitie of banishing, or murdering, the most wortheie Citizens; as also from all factions, inelaine seditions, and a thousand like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the sea-louisie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enjoyed that Citee, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the discase of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was thoroughly cur'd.

But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serues not to make inuicte the more excusable: vntlesse we should approue the answer of that Citee, who being found to haue stolen a silver cup from a sicke man, said, It neuer leanes drinking.

to have stolen a silver cup from a sick Antiochus, and to have by the treafon of Mercurius, the Roman Army was let into poffeffion of all Syria:
20 whence, wherein, the booty that it found, was faid to have been no leffe, than could have been hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it felfe; that maintained warre by Land and Sea againft them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracusæ was marvelloufly adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched; faue only the houfes of thofe banifhed men, that had efaped from Hippocrates and Epietides, into the Roman camp. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himfelfe. He was fo bufie about his Geometric in drawing figures, that he hardened not to the noife, and vprone in the City; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him.
Marcellus took heauily the death of him; and caufed his body to bee honourably 30 buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his life time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an infcription of the proportion betwene them; which hee firft found out. An Invention of fo little vfe, as this may feeme, pleased that great Artift better, than the deuifing of all thofe engines, that made him fo famous. Such difference is betwene the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar fort. For many an one would thinke the monie loft, that had been fpent vpon a fonne, whole ftudies, in the Vniuerfities had brought forth fuch fruit, as the proportion betwene
a Sphere and a Cylinder.

a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicill yielded vnto the Romans; except Aggrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Aggrigentum lay Epides with 40 one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African; that was lately sent from Hannibal.
T his Mutines, by many good peeces of seruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his persuasions, Hanno and Epides aduentured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not because they feared as men expecting to be besieged. Neither was hee more valiant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romans, where they lay encamped; and droue them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred enuie in 50 Epides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that hauing bene lately sent from Carthage, with commission and authoritie from the State, thought himselfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had sent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, and to take vpon him, like as good a man as himselfe. The indignitie seemed the greater, when Mutines, being Numidian; aduised (as directing Hanno and Epides) not to meddle with the enemy, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight; and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before hee fought it. It is like, that a great part

part of the Roman Armie was left behinde in Syracuse, as neede required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with those that came against them. But whatsoeuer disproportion was betweene the two Armies, farre greater were the odds betwene the Capitaines. For howsoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth, and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceiued some displeasure against their Capitaines: and being therefore some of them gone away to Heracles; were much more offended, when they saw that the vaine-glorious enuie of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a fool th desire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their 10
Countriman. Wherefore they sent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident: for that it was not their purpose to shew themselves his enemies that day; but onely looke on, and see the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had bene misused. They made good their promise; and had their desire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their message, did so lustily set vpon the enemies, that he brake them at the first charge; and with the slaughter of many thousands, droue them backe into Agigentum.

If Hanno could haue beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of warre than himselfe, and not haue hazarded a battell without neede; the Romans would shortly haue beene reduced into termes of great difficulty in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was shortly after to leaue the Province; and soone 20 vpon his departure, they landed in the Iland a supply of eight thousand foote, and three thousand Numidian horse, that were sent from Carthage. The same of this new Armie drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie, consisting (for the most part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very hainously, that no good seruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as banished men, they were sent farre from home, and not suffered to returne backe to Rome with their Generall. Mutines had pacified his Countrimen the Numidians; and, like an honest man, did the best that he could for those whom he serued, without contending against the foolish pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue bene, if the Armie lately ouertrowne had bene entire. 30
M. Cornelius, the Roman Pretor, vsed all diligence, both to pacifie his owne men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered those inland Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Countrie; yet hee hindered the Countrie from revoluing vnto Mutines. About three score Townes, great and small, the Carthaginians held in Sicily: of which, Agigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the rest. Thence issued Mutines as often as he pleased, in despite of the Romans: not only to the succor of his owne adherents, but to the great waste of those that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in stead of being pleased with all these good seruices, was filled more and more with enuie, against the man that performed them. He had (belike) receiued intrusion 40 from old Hanno at Carthage, not to suffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue share in the honor of these Sicilian warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently supplied; whilst Italy was neglected, that should haue beene regarded more then all the rest. Wherefore, to shew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Assistant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne sonne; thinking thereby to discountenance the man, and make him little esteemed, as one out of Office, among his Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this spitefull dealing, occasioned the losse of whatsoeuer the Carthaginians held in Sicily. For the Numidians were so incensed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countriman, being such a braue Com- 50 mander, that they offered him their seruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth absolutely at his owne disposition. M. Valerius Lænius, the Roman Consul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke these indignities: but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauoured by those that bore all the sway in Carthage; He thought it the wisest way, to play the best of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to perish by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore, as his Countrimen had lately done, content himselfe to see his Adversaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof hee would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliuer vp Agigentum, and to helpe to expell them vtterly out of Sicily. The Consul was glad of this friendship: and carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needfull, to the performance of that which Mutines 10 had vnder-taken. For hee with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate, where at they let in some Roman Companies that lay neere in a readinesse for the purpose. Hanno, when first hee heard the noise, thought it had bene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as hee had bene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and sauing himselfe, with Epicides, in a small Barke, let saile for Africk, leauing all his Armie and Adherents in Sicily, to the mercie of the Romans; that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Lænius the Consul hauing taken Agigentum, did sharpe execution of justice 20
vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them hee scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the rest of them he sold for slaues, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raised of the bootie. This was indeede a time, wherein Rome stood in no lesse necessitie of gold, than of Steele: which may haue bene the reason, why Lænius dealt so cruelly with the Agigentines. Neuertheless the fame of such seueritie bred a terror among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yielded themselves quickly vnto the Romans; twentie were deliuered vp by Treason; and fixe onely staid to be 30 wonne by force. These things done, Lænius returned home to Rome: carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agitirna; that were a companie of out-laws, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoile of others, in these troublesome times. He bestowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exercise their occupation against the Brutians; a theeuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he liued in good account; accompanying the two Scipio's in their iourne against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especial seruice. So by this enterprise of Sicily, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue bene employed in Italy: leauing yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire possession of this Iland; 40 which they wanted when it beganne.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betwene the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metinurus.

Shortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good seruices done in the Iland of Sicily, he had granted vnto him the honour of the lesser Triumph, which vvas called Ouatien. The greater Triumph was denied him: because hee had not finished the warre, but vvas faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Province. Hee staid not long in Rome, before hee vvas againe chosen Consul together with

with M. Valerius Laevinus, who succeeded him in the gouernement of Sicily, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done vnto them : they alleging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly break the alliance, excepting when it was oppressed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned vp the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him : willing them to bemoane themselves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their necessitie ; and not vnto the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part hauing some good matter to alledge, the Senate made such an end of the controuersie, as best agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth : blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not restoring the bootie that hee had taken, nor making the Syracusians free from their subiection, but comforting them, with gentle words, and hopefull promises, as hath bene shewed before. The two new Consuls, Marcellus and Laevinus, were appointed to make warre, as their lots should fall out; the one in Italy; the other in Sicily. The Isle of Sicily fell vnto Marcellus: which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracusians (whose cause had not as yet bene heard in the Senate) might not seeme hindred by feare, from vttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his businessse with them was dispatcht, hee gently undertooke the patronage of them : which remained long in his Familie : to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Consul, was sent into Sicily, whose doings there haue bene already rehearsed : but Marcellus was employed against Hannibal.

Before the Consuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with pressing of Souldiers to the warre; and most of all, with getting Mariners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer sort, that vsed to be employed in Sea-seruices, especially in rowing. These could not liue without present wages : neither was there monie enough in the Treasurie to giue them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they should be set out at the expence of priuate men; who, in this necessitie of the state, were driuen to sustaine all publike charges. Hereat the People murmured : and were readie to fall into sedition; had not the Consuls deferred the matter vnto further consideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a case of such extremite. For manifest it was, that the multitude had already endured so much, as well it could vnder-goe; and somewhat more, than could with honestie haue been imposed vpon it. Neuerthelessse it was impossible to maintaine the warre against the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italy, without a strong fleet. Wherefore, some were of opinion; That, since the common Treasurie was so empty, the people must be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At last the Consuls beganne to say, That no perswasions would be so effectuall with the people, as good examples : and that if the Senators would follow the Consuls, like it was, that the People also would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That euery one of them should bring forth, and put into the Treasurie, all the monie that hee had; and that no Senator should keepe any vessell of gold, or plate whatsoeuer; excepting one salt-seller, and a boule wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods; as also a Ring for himselfe, with such other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euery one did vse, and those of as small value as might be. This aduice of the Consuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded; and hastily followed by the Gentlemen of so Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuse to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For since the publike necessity could no otherwise be holpen; euery one was contented, that his priuate estate should runne the same fortune with the Common-wealth; which if it suffered wrack, in vaine could any particular man man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper substance. This magnanimitie deferred well that greatness of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Conuenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citie against Hannibal; and Laevinus toward Sicily. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminished, by long and hard seruice: neither did his Carthaginians seeme to remember him, and thinke vpon sending the promised supply; or any such proportion as he needed. His credit also among his Italian friends, was much weakened, by the losse of Capua: which gaue them cause to looke vnto themselves; as if in his helpe there were little truit to be reposed, when they should stand in need. This he well perceiued; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he must the vnt Garrison into all Townes that he suspected, and thereby so diminish his armie; that he should not bee able to keepe the field : or else hee must leaue them to their owne fidelitie, which now beganne to wauer. At length his jealousie grew so outrageous, that he sacked, and wasted, those places that he was vnable to defend: thinking that the best way to enrich himselfe; and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchase from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him; and some of those, whom before he had least cause to doubt. The towne of Salapia yeelded vnto Marcellus; and betrayed vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that serued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, then the Towne it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Daglus, which was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Daglus in priuate; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuicted, and charged of Treason, he stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter denied out of meere malice; knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his aduersarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with such liuely reasons; that he who could not be belieued by Hannibal, was contented at length to winne the fauor of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul rooke by force, Marones and Meles, Townes of the Samnites: wherein hee slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once; but was faine to catch aduantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than hee. The best was, that his Carthaginians, hauing wearied themselves with ill speede in many pettie enterprises, and laide aside all this while the care of Italy, to follow businessse of farre lesse importance; had now at length resolved, to send presently the great supply, that had bene so long promised and expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it selfe might haue bene stricken downe, the next yeere after that great blow receiued at Canna. But since that which is past cannot be amended: Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mighty succour would come time enough. For Masaniissa was at Carthage with fife thousand Numidians, ready to set sail for Spain: whither when hee came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal should forthwith take his iourne into Italy, of which there had bene so long talk. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best : the Romans to prevent the threatening mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the coming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, so Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Pretor, lay nere vnto Herdomea to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, since, nere vnto the same place, another Cn. Fulvius had lost his armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdomea ere Fulvius heard newes of his approach. As loone as hee came, he offered battale to the Roman Pretor: who accepted it with more haste than good speede. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout; and great slaughter was made of them. Fulvius himself, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were lost: of the common souldiers that were slain, the number is uncertaine; some reporting seven, others thirteenth thousand. The Towne of Herdouea, because it was at point to have yeelded vnto Fulvius, Hannibal did set on fire; and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemy, carried away the multitude; whom he bestowed among the Thuriens and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote vnto the Senate; and exhorted them to be of a good cheare; for that he would shortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apace; and over-taking him at Namisstro in the countie of the Lucans, fought with him a battaile: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darknesse, with uncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apuia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often; and fought to bring the enemy within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light and vpon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Roman affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne; like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that serued vnder him the yeere before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might haue no leisure to helpe Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. Hee followed him therefore to Cannusium, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall termes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemy with skirmish; as being desirous to keep his Army strong vntill the coming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunitie of Marcellus; nor brooke the indignitie of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustie, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to bee at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile: wherein Hannibal had the victorie; and tooke fixe Ensignes; and slue of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that hee rated his men, as Pefants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had bene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumvented by any stratagem. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, hee did so vex them; that thinking themselves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall, they besought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies formost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victorie; whereof the newes might bee at Rome, before the report of their shamefull overthrow. Hannibal was angrie, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was readie to fight againe; since all other motives continued the same, and his men had bene heartened by the late victorie. But the Romans were stirred vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselves disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victorie, as readie to molest them as before. In this second battaile Marcellus got the victorie: which hee purchased at so

deare a rate; that neither hee, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late receiued overthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Marcellus from pursuing Hannibal, who dislodged by night. Neuerthelesse it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fulvius the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Yolcentes, that willingly yeelded themselves, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fulvius entertained in louing fort; gently rebuking them for their errors past, without punishing those that had ben authors, or buie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theues, which Lexinius had lately brought from Agaturna, was then also set on work to besiege Caulonia, a towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serue to diuert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, late downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carrie it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, shee gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her loue was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, hee might perhaps be wonne, by intreatie of his Mistress, to doe what shee would haue him. The Consul hearing this: and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his souldier to conuey himselfe into the Towne as a fugitive; and trie what good might be done. It fell out, according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne persuasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister; wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolved how to order it; the same souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him, in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe, with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate; whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines, and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market-place: but as hapneth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away; not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vsed now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well vsed, because of hospitality that had passed betwene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword: in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue beene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that hee might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glorie which he expected, nor preferred his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being

being told of some Idols, that seemed worthier to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let vs leave vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Canlonia. They fled at his coming: but hee was so neere, that they were faine to be take them to a Hill, which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this businesse was done, hee hasted away to relieue Tarentum. But when hee came within fiew miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieved him: yet hee said no more than this, The Romans haue also their HANNIBAL; we haue lost 10 Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne back amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few daies together, so neere as hee was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgiue them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie: who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote back by them vnto the Metapontins, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure, made readie his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the iournie to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were emploied againe: but being apprehended, and threatened with torture, they discovered all.

This yeere was happie to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got every where; saue onely at Canlonia; where they lost a companie of such lewd fellowes, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue so been rid of them. But their common poertie, and disabilitie to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thurtie Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelue refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered; that the Legions of Canna, and those vnhappie Companies, that had beene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fuluius; were transported into Sicil; where they liued, in a fort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhausted with leues of men, and impositions of monie: in euery of which yeeres they had receiued some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best which they could hope; was, to fall into the hands of the enemy to bee made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was raken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should beall consumed: since new Souldiers were daily pressed forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer did returne. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldly denie vnto the Romans, their fathers helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any further help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadors to returne home, and bring a 50 better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campanians, or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans; and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadors continuing to protest, that they

they had already done what they could; and that they had remaying, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eightene Colonies did not imitate these twelue; but shewed themselves willing to vndergoe whatsoever should be layed vpon them, without thinking vnder the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls; that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good seruises, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, & thanks accordingly bestowed vpon them; with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute; it was thought best, neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their owne consideration of their ill delerung.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue people would haue wrought, in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubal had been then coming into Italie. For then must the Romans haue betaken themselves wholly to their owne defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their subiects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuerthelesse, they were faine to open their most priue treasure; and thence take out the golde, that had beene layed vp to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie. 20 Of the mony thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Consul, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie; and to prouide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italie. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money; finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the iourney of Asdrubal; neither the money sent into Spaine, nor any victories wonne by Scipio could suffice. Neuerthelesse it fell out happily for the People of Rome, that this yeare, and the next, were spent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessity of money, were driuen to furnish 30 the Armie in Spaine, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs bee, thareither the bootie taken in new Carthage, was farre lesse then fame had reported it; or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoeuer Liue rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arriuall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fuluius. In their yeere it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spaine, though he came not into Italie vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canna, Hannibal had lost much time about Canna and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Master of a good haue, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italie; where he made readie a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if hee had beene readie to come. But since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later then had beene expedient) readie to arriue: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein hee might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes, from harkening to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouerty of the Roman, and the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Armie coming, then that which Hannibal brought into Italie, did embolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arretines, to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senat, hearing the rumour of their conspiracie, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeere following they were 50

deuiling how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors; partly by terror of seuerer iudgements and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills; and tooke many Hottages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising; perswading themselves, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italie: and brought thither all sorts of engines; sending for a fleet out of Sicily to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the Citie: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise and retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no neede to stand vpon his reputation; which was already confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some aduantage; reseruing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater employment. In this lingering manner of Warre, Marcellus tooke no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemy to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicily, L. Cincius, was commanded againe to assaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he beganne to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to goe by Land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, betwene Tarentum and Locri; whereinto the Romans fell; and hauing lost about three thousand of their companie, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and saue their owne hues within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no aduantage. There lay betwene him and them an Hillock, over-grown with wood, that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there vndiscovered, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee would keepe themselves close, and attend their best aduantage. To this piece of ground, the Consuls thought it fit to remoue their Campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neerer enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the sonne of Marcellus, a few Colonells, and other principall men; and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinell gaue warning of their approach to his fellows; who discouered not themselves, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls and their traine. The Consuls, as necessitie compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ranne away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weake assistance of no more than fortie horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregellæ. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then became euerie one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consull, had his death wound, being stricken with two Darts; and yong Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their campe: The rest of the Colonells and Officers; together with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slaine or taken. To the dead bodie of the Consull Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing bestowing his ashes in a siluer pot, couered it with a crowne of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the ligner Ring of Marcellus was fallen into the custodie of Hannibal; who might vse it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore hee sent word vnto all the Townes about; that his Colleague was slaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arriued there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captiue Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where hee willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such employment as he should thinke needfull. The deuice was plaine: and no lesse plaine was the reuengefull minde, which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein bene betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselves, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readinesse, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened, faire and leifurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needes it must bee, to let them enter. But when sixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselves; being laied at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an ende with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, halied away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicily, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcursors, made the Romans in all confused haste, runne to their ships: leauing all their engines, and whatsoeuer was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the suruiuing Consul, and requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other business; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurrs. Hee did so: and scone after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so neere vnto the Enemy, without any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were not onely valiant, but well aduised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by loosing himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. Hee was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more stayed wit. The fathers therefore endeouored to ioine vnto him in the Consulship M. Liuius: one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Liuius had been Consul with L. Æmilius Paulus, in the yere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good seruice, they had both of them bin called into iudgement by the People: and this Liuius condemned; Æmilius hardly elcaping. Though it hath bin once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vprайд the vthankfull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honorable men: for in the battaile of Cannæ, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Aemilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and after ward to die in the greatest ouerthrow, that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe answ vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Linius, he is euen now readie, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faultis in a diuers manner. Eight yecres together after his condemnation had hee bene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrie Grange; vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Launus, being Consuls two or three yecres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued priuate in discontented sort as might appeare, both by his carelesnesse in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Verelately he was compelled by the Cenfors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where hee vsed to sit silent, and signifie his assent or dislike to what was proposed; either in short formall words, or in passing from side to side, when the houle was diuided. At length it hapned, that in some busines weightily concerning one that was his kinsman, he stood vp, and made a set speech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had bene. The Senate was much altered since he had left it; many braue men were lost; new ones were choosen; such as rather serued to fill vp the number, than to answere to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient standing, had euen spent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to say; that it was great pittie, so worthy and able a man, as this Linius, had bene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth stood in great neede, yet had not vied in this dangerous warre. Now seeing that the Consuls ought, one of them, to be choosen a Patrician, the other, of necessitie a Plebeian: and since, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Laetinus, being both of them Patricians, could be ioyned with Claudius Nero: euery one was of opinion, that there could not be chosen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Linius. But Linius would not endure to heare of this. He said it was vnreasonable, that one condemned as a dishonest man, should afterwards be choosen 30 Ruier of the Citie. If they had done ill to trust him with one Consulship, what meant they then to offer him another? With these, and the like phrases he resisted their desires: till by perswasions, and examples rehearsed, of such as had patiently digested iniuries done by the People, and repaid good for euill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Embleme, with which Themistocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: resembling himselfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughes whereof men breake in faire weather; but runne vnder it for shelter in a storme. Such vnthankfulnesse, to well-deseruing men, is not rarely found in the outrageous multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the second King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alsa. For although he had committed the Duke to prison, vpon some small offence conceived, without all regard of his former defects: yet when his intended conquest of Portugal, required the seruice of a man, more then ordinarily sufficient; hee stood no longer vpon the Canning of late displeasures, but employed the same Duke, whom he had newly disgraced. This is wisdom often taught by necessitie.

It was a dangerous yecre to ward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Linius were choosen Consuls. Asdrubal was alreadye come into France, and waited only, to haue the waies of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his passage into Italy. The Romans vied at this time the seruice of three and twentie Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leuie and maintaine them. Of these which they had, foure serued in Spaine, two in Sicil and two in Sardinia: the rest were so disposed, in severall parts of Italy, where need seemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Consuls. But the Consuls were men of execution, execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall obseruance of what the S. name thought fit. M. Linius would not stirre out of Rome, against so mightie a power as followed Asdrubal; vntill he had first obtained, that hee might carry with him as many as could well be spared from other imployments; and those, or the most of them, choosen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to serue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yere, among the Stilpine Gauls, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Linius; to whom the warre against Asdrubal was allotted. So might also two other Legions, that were among the Salentine, nere vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie; that was sent against Hannibal. Neuertheless the Consuls, by the especiall instance of Linius, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne discretion. For newes came, that Asdrubal was alreadye passing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrie about Genoa, with their Neighbour people, were in readinesse to ioyne with him; and L. Porcius sent word, that he would adventure no further, then hee fairly might. When all was ordered, as themselves thought best, the two Consuls went forth of the Citie; each, his seuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwise affected, than they had bene, when L. Aemilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals; or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes: but rather they stood in feare; lest all diligence, wisdom and valour should proue too little. For since few yecres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not bene slaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victors; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extreme difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer since the battaile of Cannae; though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italy. But there was now arriued another sonne of Amilcar, and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, where as in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, over great Rivers, and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplied his numbers; and gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-ball, farre greater than he came over the Pyrennees at his first setting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the People of Rome, to wait vpon their Consuls out of the Towne; like a penfue traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus & Crispinus, vpon whom in the like sort they had giuen attendance the last yere; but saw neither of them returne aliae, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Linius, that he should abstaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recover his honour by victorie; or by seeing the ouerthrow of his owne vnjust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the ioy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the ouerthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spaine, by Scipio, a little before hee tooke his iourne into Italy; such mention hath alreadye been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Linius. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reason of those Capitaines that were sent from the Citie of Carthage, to ioyne with him in the administration of that Province: they being, as it may seme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the ad-

uantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthe soane of Amilcar, and how they hindred his courtes vnder taken, it cannot bee knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polihins hath exactly handled these matters, there are to vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the sightfull dealing of Hannoin Stiel with Antimes, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Land: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needfull, by these mischieuous Partisans of Hanno, to vie the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuertheless Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Antimes could not long digest. His iourne into Italie being resolved vpon: he lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the mines of silver; whence he was to furnish his Expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe, though he were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The overthrow seemes not to haue beene so great, as it must haue been supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Asdrubal dealt like a prudent man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, sent away all his monie, with his Elephants before him: but staid behinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might bee out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retired in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his Expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenes: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Stago, and to Asdrubal the sonne of Gegeo; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio haue stopped him on his iourne, by sending to defend against him the ordinarie way of the Mountaines. But whether Asdrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keepe the Pyrenes (as the defence of hard passages commonly forts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voiage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal; he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his monie, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their numbers much increased, by access of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choice: for that he was driven to Winter in their Countrey; whilst that the passages of the Alpes were closed vp with Ice and Snow. The Mountaines likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iourne ouer the Alpes; were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he trauailed through their Countrey. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to robbe them of their cattails; and to make spoile of that little wealth, which they had painefully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in proccesse of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mightie Cities, farre disioyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land, and Sea; and that the Alpes did only lie in their way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gaules. The Ligurians also ioyined with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians haue done; if he had arriued in their Countrey. There was no other Roman Armie neere, then L. Porcius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie; in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there hee lost a great deale of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterprise: by vnder taking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure to make readie for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintering camps, and go forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speede hee could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about fortie thousand foot, and fise hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginian; and had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, into the Countrey of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the iourne intended. Afterward comming to Grunceturum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuertheless he got off, and marched away to Peoncia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to returne to Metapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Armie, he called againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed on ward, and came againe to Peoncia, hauing Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Ruer Anficus to Canusium, where he fate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victorie. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrey very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, overcome the way to Canusium: where if he could once againe deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victorie, as once he had gotten in the same open Countrey. If this had so fallen out; Rome would haue beene vndone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue needed to wish any second victorie, in the naked Champons about Cannae; if such an armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when hee was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherefore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beat him out of Italie; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilst Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour: he was aduertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew on wards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could bee made by Linus the Consul. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing ioyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioynd as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparrant, that howeouer the fortune of Rome should auoid, for the present, any great calamitie; yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonies had already done. W herefore hee resolved, that it were better to make any desperate aduenture, than to suffer the conjunction of two such malevolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the suddaine, yet within few yeres, was like to worke most lamentable effect. It seemed apparrant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readines, that could doe seruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Here vpon hee concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tie himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessitie required; and to carry part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian bretheren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in truft, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choice of his Armie: and making these, as if he would only step aside, to doe some small piece of seruice neere at hand; away he posted as fast as hee could, to assist assist his fellow Consul. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which he was to passe, that they should be ready to meet him, with vituals, and all other necessaries for his Armie. Linus the other Consul, at that time, lay incamped, nere vnto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In fixe daies Nero had finished his iourne thither; and when he drew nere, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his comming. Linus thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: lest the Enemy, perceiving this accesse of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done; and as token giuen, that the Colonells, Captaines, and all Souldiers, as foot, as horse, that Nero had brought with him; should bee lodged and entertained by men of their owne fort. Their Companie was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that joyned with them on the way. Neuerthelesse, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should bee enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arrived Companies, to refresh themselves a few daies after their wearie iourne, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hannibal should haue notice of his absence. The souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiving that the honour of the victorie was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue beene vnderaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generalls pavilion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile, hauing long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long iourne. Hereupon he beganne to draw his Armie backe into the Campe: and gaue order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom he might bee certified of the truth; yet should there good obseruation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The campe, as hath beene said, was not extended: but the trumpeter, that sounded only once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, found twice in the quarter of Linus the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders; held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were aliue, and in good case, he was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke; till he might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how nere he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when hee now perceived, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, hee changed his resolution; and held it no dishonour to remove a little further off. So hee dislodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the Riuer Metaurus; whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessity of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did sleale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heauie, and hindered his speede: farre hee had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staid him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouer-taken with necessity to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, hee placed in his left wing vpon a Hill,

which the Enemy should not, without much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe, with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants, hee bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Linus of the left; and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderstood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safetie there was vnto the vanquished. Only the Romans herein seemed to haue had the beter in conceipt, and opinion; That they were to fight with men delirious to haue fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Linus the Consul with a proud brauery, to giue charge on the Africans: by whom he was so sharpe entertained, that the victorie seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout soldiers; and well acquainted with the maner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Linus therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, preuailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants; that brake their first ranks; and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules; that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero, perceiving that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; tooke a part of his forces, and led them round behinde the forces of Porcius and Linus: which hauing compassed, he fell vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here beganne the victorie to be manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ranne all along the depth of Asdrubal his battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rowt. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on euery side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could; and saved themselves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken aliue: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons; others by their owne guides that rode them. For when any of them, being sore wounded, beganne to waxe vnruly, and rush backe vpon their owne battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke betweene the eares, in the joynt of the necke, next vnto the head; wherewith hee killed the beast vpon the suddaine. This speedy way of preventing such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squadrons following them; is said to haue bene the deuice of Asdrubal himselfe; who died in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Linus. He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother; to haue striuen with great patience, against many difficulties, wherinto he fell by the meanes of those Captaines, that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to haue performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally when hee saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where fighting branely, hee was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Linus, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Linus saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an ouerthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Canna; that fiftie fixe thousand of them were slaine, fixe thousand & foure hundred taken prisoners; and aboute foure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand: and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kindes; but in gold and siluer. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it.

Likely

Likely it is to haue bene as rich as Luie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well fortified with monie. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a parale vnto that of Cannæ) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to haue bene slaine. The number of the prisoners he doeth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken aliuie; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Whereby it may seeme, that they were all Barchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselves, and of their Countie, about their liues.

The joy of this victorie was no lesse in Rome, than had bene the feare of the euent. For euer since it was knowne in what Rome had left his Armie; the whole Citie was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consul should make such a great aduenture, as thus to put the one halfe of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to haue notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Armie that staid behinde, much weakned, and without a General? Thus did they talke: yet referring their censure vnto the successe; with libertie to approve or condemn, according to the issue. In the meane while the People filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting still ready at hand vpon the Magistrats: as if some great matter were likely to fall out, that would require euery ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleue it. Afterwards when Messengers arriued from the Consuls, with Letters containyng all that had passed: there was not only great and joyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the Citie was altered; and men from thenceforth beganne to follow their private businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborne to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italie.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them loof to giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of this misaduenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generalls, whose carcases fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Commonweale; yet in dealing with Enemies, they were farre more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolencie of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that hee hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deepe impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himselfe, being ouer-joyed with the greatnesse of his prosperitie. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the balance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the lowest Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italie; with-drew himselfe into the Countie of the Brutians: and thither hee caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend in many places as he held at the present, because they lay too farre asunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a lesser compasse in the vmoost corner of Italie; it being a Countie of much fastnesse, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his seruice. In this businesse Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either because Hannibal was too strong for him, hauing all his forces vnited; or because it is likely likely that this remoue of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their haruest was gathered in; at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Luinius the other Consul tarried among the Cisalpine Gaules vntill the end of Summer; there to set things in such order as he thought requisite: which done, hee wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more neede of him and his Armie in that Province; but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well discharge the place. For this cause, hee desired leaue to returne home; and that he might bring his Armie with him. The Senate well vnderstood his meaning: which was, to haue the honour of triumph, as he well deserved. But forasmuch as it was well knowne, what interest Nero had in the late victorie: order was giuen, that not only Luie with his Armie should come home; but likewise Nero; though leauing his Armie behinde him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Luie made the greater shew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; because in his Province, and vpon his day of command, the victorie was gotten; his Armie also being present at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horse-backe, and without such attendance, was the more extolled both by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victorie was in a manner wholly ascribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. P. Sulpicius Piso, and Q. Caelius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generalls, the due acknowledgement of their good seruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to be chosen Consuls: and Consuls they were chosen for the yeere following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memorie, in their Consulship. Neither indeede from this yeere, which was the thirteenth of the present warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italie; save only the taking of Laetri from the Carthaginians by surpris. For Hannibal wanted strength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that hee was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him; that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold him selfe vpright. And surely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius; whom Luie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the most warlike, hee obtained so many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Armie, compounded of so many sundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greekes; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; hee held them all in such good order, that they neuer fell to sedition among themselves, or against their General. But that which Luie addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he sustained his Armie, without helpe from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry soile of the Brutians: which, when it was best manured in time of peace, could hardly suffice to nourish the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in such order and obedience, rather than by any greatnesse of reward and bootie: since, after the death of Asdrubal, he made no inuasion vpon the wealthier parts of Italie; but held himselfe still among the poore Brutians. Where we must leaue him, vntill he be drawne into Africa by Scipio; whose doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

p. XVII.

How P. CORNELIUS SCIPIO the Roman, made entire conquest of Spaine.

¶. I.

How the Carthaginians were drinen by SCIPIO from the Continent into the Isle of Gades.

MAGO, & ASDRUBAL the sonne of GESCO, tooke vpon them the charge of Spaine, when ASDRUBAL the sonne of AMILCAR departed thence into Italie. These agreed together, that MAGO should make a voiage to the Baleares; there to leuie a supply of men and ASDRUBAL with-draw himselfe into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. MAGO had soone ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: where hee met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately beene employed in Scythia) who brought new forces out of Africa, and came to succcede in place of ASDRUBAL the Barchine. It is not vnlike-ly 20 that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that sonne of AMILCAR, whose authoritie had beene greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno aproue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriors; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men.
Whether it were vpon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought over: Hanno tooke the field, and led MAGO with him; as purposing afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entered into the Countrie of the Celiberians, not very farre from new Carthage:
where, by monie, and other perswasions, he leuied about nine thousand men.

P. SCIPIO in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine:
attentive, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of ASDRUBAL the sonne of AMILCAR; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Ita-lie, to the assistance of C. CLAUDIUS NERO, and M. LINIUS the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and MAGO, among the Celiberians: he sent M. SYLLANUS the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse. SYLLANUS got intelligence by some fugitiue Celiberians, who became his guides, that their Countreimen encamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neere to these Celiberians: and falling vpon them on the suddaine, gaue them such an ouer-throw, that Hanno and MAGO coming to their succour, in stead of heartning & reinforcing them, became partakers of the losse. MAGO saued himselfe, with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies iourney brought them safeto ASDRUBAL. The rest of the African were either slaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight until all was lost. As for the Celiberians, they knew better how to make shift, & saued most of themselves by running into the woods.

It could no otherwise bee, but that SCIPIO was much troubled with the danger wherein Italie stood, by the coming thither of ASDRUBAL. Ten thousand foot and eigheteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spaine (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentiue to the necessity & successe of his Countreimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Me-tanurus, which fell out long before the end of this Summer, then might hee well aduenture

uenture, to take in hand the entire conquest of Spaine; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an ouerthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that serued vnder Hannibal, and those that had beene sent ouer into Africa; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Countrie was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noised abroad, That all which had followed ASDRUBAL into Italie, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Armie, was closed vp in a streight, whence he could not get out: thend did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselves vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italie, which gaue such confidence vnto SCIPIO; it is the more probable, because hee tooke not this great enterprise in hand, vntill the Summer was almost spent. ASDRUBAL therefore vied the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons, hindred the Ene-mie, from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused SCIPIO to returne backe: without any other mar-ter performed, than that his Brother L. SCIPIO tooke by assault the Towne of Oringis.

Against the next yeeres danger, ASDRUBAL prepared a great Armie: and spared not cost, nor trauaile, in strengthening himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With seuentie thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirtie 20 Elephants, he tooke the field: which number I beleue, that he could hardly haue raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italie.
SCIPIO thought his Roman Legions too weake to encounter with such a multitude.
Wherefore hee iudged it needfull to vse the helpe of his Spanish friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were cast away by the treason of such false Auxiliaries; made him on the other side very doubtfull, of relying vpon those, that might perhaps betray him in his greatest neede. Yet since one Colchus, that was Lord of eight & twentie Townes, had promised him the last Winter, to raise three thousand foot, and five hundred horse for his seruice: hee resolved to make vse of those, and some few others; that might helpe to make a shew; and yet not bee 30 able to doe great harme, if they would reuolt. So with five and fortie thousand foot, and three thousand horse, he sought out the Enemy; neere to whom hee in-camped. At his first coming, MAGO and MASINISSA fell vpon him; with hope to take him vnprepared, whilst hee was making his lodgings. But hee layed certain troups of horse in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected; caused them to fall off. They made at first an orderly retreat: but being more hardly pressed, they shortly betooke themselves to plaine flight. After this encounter, which added some courage to the Romans, and abated the presumption of the Carthaginians: there were daily skirmishes betweene the horse and light armature, on both sides; wherein was nothing done of importance. ASDRUBAL drew forth his Armie, and arranged 40 it before his Trenches: the like did SCIPIO; each of them to shew that he durst fight, yet not proceeding any further. Thus they continued many daies: ASDRUBAL being still the first that issued forth in the morning, and the first that, in the euening, withdrew himselfe into his Trenches. The Spanish Auxiliaries were placed on both sides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midst, with their Elephants before them; and opposite to these on the other side were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre distance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they should shortly meet in the same forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies, long before designed. But SCIPIO, when hee purposed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and 50 withall, came forth earlier then he had been wont. He caused his men and horses, to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then sent forth his horse and light armature, to traîne out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: vying herein the same trick, whereby he might remember, that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he bestowed in the wings; his Spaniards, Z z z z z

in the battaile. Aſdrubal ſent forth his horſe in all haſte, to entertaine the Romans; whileſt he himſelfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, upon which he encamped. In the ſkirmiſhes of the horſe it could not be diſcerned which part had the better: ſince being over-preſſed on either ſide, they had a ſafe retreat vnto their foot; and one troupe ſeconding another by courſe, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: becauſe his men, hauing well fed themſelves, were like to hold out better then the Enemie. But about noone, he cauſed his wings to aduance a good pace; leauing their battaile of Spaniards farre behinde them, that came on leiſurely, according to direction. The Spaniſh Mercenaries that ſtood in Aſdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, ſauie only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers, that came againſt them; for they were freſh 10 ſouldiers, leuied in haſte, and fighting only in reſpect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the ſame time, by the Roman Velites, and by ſome cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the ſame purpoſe: they were ſorely preſſed; and with much difficultie made reſiſtance. The Carthaginians would ſaine haue ſuccoured them; but that they durſt not ſtirre out of their places, becauſe of the Spaniſh battaile which was coming againſt them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the beſt part of Aſdrubal his Armie ſtood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For, had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards, he muſt haue caſt himſelfe into the open ſpace that lay before him betwene the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when he had arriued, he ſhould haue found himſelfe incloſed in ſuch fort, as was the Conſul Penius; at the battaile of Canna. Wherefore he did onely employ his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harme to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chaſed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ranne, as chance led them, and troubled both parts for thoſe perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In proceſſe of the fight: the Romans, who had well reſreſhed their bodies in the morning, endured luſtie; when the others beganne to faint with 20 trauell and heate of the day. Wherefore perceiving their aduantage, they followed it the more hotly; and gaue not ouer, till they had ſori the enemie to change his pace and runne from him. Aſdrubal did his beſt to haue made an orderly retreat; and afterward againe, to haue cauſed his men turne head, at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not ſuffer the victorie to be ſo extorted from them: neither was it ealie to put freſh courage into the vanquiſhed; led by the obſtinate paſſion of feare which harkens to no perſwaſion. The Campe of Aſdrubal had that day bene taken; if a ſtorme of raine, which fell violently on the ſuddaine, and bred ſome ſuperſtition in the Romans, had not cauſed them to giue 30 ouer.

The ſame night, Aſdrubal gaue no reſt to his men: but cauſed them, hungrie, and ouerlaboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherein hee feared to be aſſaulted. But little aſſurance could he haue in the ſtrength of his Trenches; when he had loſt the hearts of his Spaniſh Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his ſubiects: many followed this example; and ſooner after, two ſtrong Townes were yeilded vp to Scipio, and the Garrifons betrayed. It ſeemes that the peruerſe fortune of this late battaile, wherupon Aſdrubal had ſet his reſt, bred in the Spaniards a diſpoſition, to beleue the more eaſily thoſe reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Aſdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himſelfe, and marched away, faſter than an ordinarie pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning; & ouertaking the Carthaginians with his horſe, cauſed them ſo often to make ſtand; that they were at length 40 attached by the Roman Legions. Here beganne a cruell ſlaughter: for there was no reſiſtance made, but all fell to rout, ſauie onely ſeuē thouſand, that with Aſdrubal himſelfe recouered a very ſtrong piece of ground, which they fortified in haſte.

This

This place he made ſhift awhile to defend: but wanting there neceſſaries to ſuſtaine himſelfe long, he was ſoraken by ſome of thoſe few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he reſolued to make ſhift for one; and ſtealing from his Companie by night away to the Sea ſide, that was not farre thence; he tooke ſhipping, and ſet ſaile for Gades. When Scipio vaderſtood that Aſdrubal was thus gone: he left Syllanus with ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe to beſiege their Campe (which was not taken in haſte, for Mago and Maſaniſſa ſtaied in it) whileſt he with the reſt of the Armie did what was needful in the Countrey abroad. It was not long ere Mago and Maſaniſſa followed Aſdrubal to Gades; and their Armie diſperſed 10 it ſelfe; ſome flying ouer to the Romans; other taking what way they liked. So vpon all the continent of Spaine, there were only three Townes left, Iliturgi, Caſtulo, and Aſapa, that made countenance of warre againſt the Romans: of which only Caſtulo had in it a Carthaginian Garrifon; conſiſting of ſuch as had ſaued themſelves by flight in the late ouerthrowes. Hereby it ſeemes, that the report of thoſe Hiſtorians was ill grounded, who ſaid, that Caſtulo yeelded long ſince vnto the Romans; though Hannibal tooke a wife in that Citie. For this was one of the laſt three Townes that held out on the Carthaginian ſide. Iliturgi had ſometimes bene inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death of the two elder 20 Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not onely rebelled; but with great crueltie betrayed, and ſlue, the poore men that eſcaped thither from the ouerthrowes. Aſapa was a Towne, that had ſtill adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worſe, had thrinen by ſpoile of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the Carthaginians by aſſault, and with a general ſlaughter of the Inhabitants; Caſtulo, by treaſon of one Cerdubelus. Aſapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather deſtroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raiſed in the Market-place; whereinto was throwne all the gold, and ſiluer, with whatſoeuer 30 elſe was precious; the women and children ſtanding by it vnder a ſure guard; that ſhould kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouiſion being made: all the Inhabitants that could beare armes, ruſhed forth deſperately, and fell vpon the Roman campe; where ſtriving beyond their power, they were euery one ſlaine. Then was the Towne forth with ſet on fire, by thoſe that had taken charge to doe it: and many of the Romans conſumed with the flame; whileſt they ruſhed ouer-haſtily to catch the gold, and ſiluer, which they ſaw lying on the pile readie to melt.

Aſdrubal, being beaten into the Iſland of Gades, found no cauſe of long ſtay there: but returned home to Carthage, with ſeuē Gallies; leauing Mago behinde him, to wait vpon occaſion, if any ſhould be offered. He viſited in his way home, Syphax King of the Maſſiliſſi, a people of the Numidians, hoping to winne him to the friend- 40 ſhip of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the Kings Port: who, landing at the ſame time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driuen the Carthaginians out of Spaine, did forth-with bethinke himſelfe, how to finiſh the warre; by putting them to the like diſtreſſe in Africke. Hereunto it ſeemed, that the helpe of Syphax would be much auaillable: king that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and ſuſtained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might eaſily be moued to ſeeker reuenge. He had alſo bene beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that ſent him ouer a Captaine into 50 Africke; who inſtructed him ſo well in marſhalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Vpon theſe reaſons the Numidian King ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, and made league with the Citie, in a time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceiued hope of laying a good foundation to the warre, which he intended in Africke; vpon the friendſhip of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cauſe he ſent ouer C. Lelius his Embaſſadour, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to doe

doe in Spaine, easily perswaded the King to take part with those that had the better, and were without question his better friends. Only Syphax requested, that the Roman Generall should visite him in person, to conclude the League; by which hee was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condescended; thinking the friendship of so great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre distant from Spaine, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquere Gallies heooke Sea: and arrived in the Kings Port, at the same time, with Asdrubal. This would have bene very dangerous to him, had he bene discried by his Enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven, they forbore to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; seeing at one time, two such Captaines of two most powerfull Cities, came to desire his friendship. He would have brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excused himselfe, by want of such commission from the Senate. He feared them together: and shortly dismissed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

†. II.

Funerall games held by Scipio. A Duell between two Spanish Princes.
A digression, concerning Duells.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and resting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon those of Uiturgi, Cassulo, and Aslapi, as hath bene said before. The Conquest of the Countrie being then in a manner at an end, he performed at new Carthage, with great solemnity, some Vowes that he had made, and honoured the memorie of his Father, and Uncle, with funerall games, especially of those that fought at Tharpe, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he should trouble himselfe with preparing slaues for that spectacle, to hazard their liues as was vsed in the Citie of Rome: for there were now, that either offered themselves as voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes; to giue prooffe in single combat, of the valour that was in their severall Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to referre the decilion of their Controversies, to triall of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were, Corbis, and Orfus, Cosen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers sonne: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house; after the manner of our Irish Tanistrie. But the father of Orfus stood lately seized of the Principality: which though himselfe received by the death of his elder brother; yet this his sonne would not let it goe back; but claimed to hold it as heire unto his father, and old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio haue compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in vaine, to take up that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but only Mars, their God of battaile, should be Vmpire betweene them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skillfull at his weapon, easily vanquished the foole-hardinesse of the younger.

Such combats haue bene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy, by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two at the Warre of Troy; the one betweene Paris and Meneleus; the other, betweene Hector and Alex. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that betweene David and Goliath; and others performed by some of Dauids Worthies, against those that challenged them; are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweene twelve of the Tribe of Iudas, and as many of the Bemamites. The Romans

had

had many of them: whereof that was principall, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatij, against the three brethren Curiatij that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corvinus with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman, were of lesse importance, as hauing only reference to brauerie. In England there was a great combat fought, betweene Edmond Ironside and Cnutus the Dane, for no lesse than the Kingdome. The vs of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon euery occasion, great or small. In the reigne of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Bloys, contending for the Duchie

10 of Brittaine; there was a fight, for honour of the Nations, betweene thirtie of the Britons, and thirtie English: two of which English, were Caluerlie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French warres, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them haue bene combats of brauerie, and of gayetie de cure, as the French terme it; for honour of severall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or whatsoeuer else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life; or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right.

20 And of this latter kinde, was that, of which wee spake euen now, betweene Corbis and Orfus. Vnto these (me thinkes) may bee added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that betweene David and Goliath; or that betweene the Horatij and Curiatij: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed betweene the Lord Hen- 30 rie of Boulbrooke Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir Iohn Anley and one Cattington: whom Anley charged with treason; and proued it vpon him, by being victorious. The like was fought betweene Robert of Mountfort and Henrie of Essex. The like also, betweene a Nauar- 40
rois, and one Welch of Grimsby, who the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that hee had belied him; and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if hee be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had bene due to the offender, if the accusation had bene proued; I cannot affirme. But we euery where find, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customes of Normandie, of Murder, Rape, or burning of Places (offences punished by death) bee out-come, He shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but hee may trie it by his Champion, as did Paramor and Lewes, or offered to doe, in the 40 reigne of Queene Elizabeth. And in this case, he that is beaten, or yeeldeth, looeth only his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in Campe close, that is, within railes. Now this triall by combat was so ordinarie in France, before the time of St. Lewes, and Philip the faire his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Me- 50 moriales of the Chamber of accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings fixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the partie vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vs when any man hath had an hard or vn- iudgement; saying, That hee was tried by the Law of Loray, or Berne, on le battu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trialls by battaile, that great learned man Ysa, Bishop of Chartres, did often complaine, and

Specially against the French Church-men: as appears by * his letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Arch-bishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the iudgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this libertie, and kinde of triall, was retrencht by Saint Lewis, and Philip the faire; so that no man should decree, or grant it, saue the King himselfe. It hath since beene granted, though more sparingly, by the French Kings; as to the Lord of Carouges against Jacques le Gris; and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, against Moro, his Countreiman: wherein Sir Henrie Kneut, Father of the Lord Kneut now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had the victorie, and lastly to the Lord of Chast. Now in those Challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deseruing death, (and in those only) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ses defenses per uoe dementir; The Defendant was bound to pleade not guilty, by giuing the accuser the Lie: otherwise it was concluded, that the Defendant did taiblement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But alter such time as Francis the French King, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the first, thereby to draw him to a personall combat: euery pettie Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made the giuing of the Lie mortallitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glorie, to haue it said, That the meane Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperour Charles the first had patiently endured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient, For, the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obicction and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe so many Duells, as are founded vpon mere priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthe of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly libertie, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats; the giuing of the Lie, which ought to be the Negation only in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so vnpardonable, as will admit no other recopence, 30 than the blood of him that giues it. T hus the fashon, taken vp in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the patterne of their King, is grown to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kinde of Arte and Philosophie of quarrell; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many other no lesse ridiculous) some so myssicall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receiue from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a found blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a flauie; the other to a fouldier. I confesse that the difference is pretie: though, for my owne part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly haue made with him such an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiving it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that giue it them; vse nothing so much in their conuersation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falsely. Yea it is thereby, that they thrust and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed & sworn to pay the monies and other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Liers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Inficte, vpon breach of word or bond? For he which hath promised, that he will pay monie by a day; or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him, to whom the promise hath bene made. Nay, what is the profession of loue that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice, and of all they haue, vied in their ordi- 50 ninarie dinarie complements, and (in effect) to euery man whom they bid but good-morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and courtdlike kinde of lying? It is (saith a wise French-man, deriding therein the Apollit custome of his Countrey) une marche & complot fait ensemble le se maquier, mentir, & piper les uns les autres; a kinde of merchandize, and complot made among them, to mock, belie, and deuide each other: and so farre now-a-daies in fashon, and in vize; as he that vlieth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinctions) that there is great difference betwene these mannerly & complementall lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity vpon breach of promise, and those which men 10 vse out of cowardize and feare: the latter confessing themselves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other filled the most villainous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subject of all our deadly quarrells in effect: to it I say, That who so giues another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, that he hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promisseth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promised, that hee will performe it; and, in not performing it, he hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that giues any man the Lie, when himselfe knows that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not lied; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause haue I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine, and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's mid-night; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life; giues it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not denie but it is an extreme rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with an vntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice against whom the vntruth is vttered) but all that is rude, ought not to be civilized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, That these discourses fauour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize, to feare God or Hell: whereas he that is truly wise, and truly valiant, knows that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword wee shall finde ten thousand such penie-men (waged at 30 that price in the warres) that feare it as little, and perchance lesse, than any profest Sword-man in the World. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preseruer of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritie between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem perire: sic nec fortem pugnare; sed causam; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which whofoeuer shall resolutely end his life, resolutely in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as hee may iustly be numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious 40 hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe weindeede take our owne reuenge, or punish the injuries offered vs, by the death of the injurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would be reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death on our owne consciences; Animasque in vulnere ponere; et ad diuinae nostrae salutis in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne in generous and noble spirits the defence of their honours, being prest with injuries? I say that I doe not; if the injuries bee violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; doe fauour him that is assailed, in the laughter of the Assailant. You will secondly aske 50 me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentle-man, being challenged by Cardt by one of like qualitie, bee not bound in point of honour to satisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I answer that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrarie and opposit to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion on cr it, which can iudge iudge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Actes honourable, where the Hang-man giues the Garland. For seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror; and the Lawes of God appointed the Devil to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, and a foole, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the Kings of England, and other Christian Kings, haue seldome taken any such aduantage ouer men of qualitie; who vpon euen termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble-men and Gentle-men in former ages, in all important injuries, sue vnto the King, to approue themselves by battaile and publique combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law: so did they disdain to submit themselves to the shamefull reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Theeves. Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders; Yet is not the Manslaier freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieved notwithstanding; that is, to require iustice by Grand Assize, or by battaile, vpon his appeal, which (saith S. Thomas Smith) is not denied; and he further saith (for I vse his owne wordes) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man slaier) be conuicted either by Great Assize or by Battaille, vpon that appeal; the Man slaier shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) 20 are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to iustice, and to the punishment of blood violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men & Gentle-men shall be repaired in honour, where an enemy, taking the start either in wordes or blowes, shall lay on them an infamie vn-sufferable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily giue satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recouerie of four Debts, Goods, and Lands, and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wiues, and children, are sustained, to the Iudges of the Law; because it may bee felonie, to take by violence euen that which is our owne: why should we not submit our selues to the Iudges of honour in cases of honour; because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may be murder? But yet 30 againe it may be objected, That the losse of honour ought to be more fearefull vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, or of our liues; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeede, and that which ought to bee so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of historie, or fame following actions of verue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publique good? In these he that is imploied and trusted, if he faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he looeth his honor. But the acting of a priuate combat, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of verue; because it is contrarie to the law of God, and of all Christian Kings: neither is it difficult; because euen and equall in persons and 40 armes: Neither for a publique good, but tending to the contrarie; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to saue every mans fame and reputation, as farre as reputation may sustaine iniurie by wordes, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any ill words that we haue giuen, and to confesse that we haue done him wrong to whom we haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For hee that giues ill words in choller, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduilement; hath the disaduantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeede not to be giuen but to those that are seruile, whether their recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Adou-fieur de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement,

Sir Thomas
Smith in his Comm. wealth
of Engl.

ment, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sat: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe; and in his left hand the like cudgell or battinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to vse his owne discretion in the reuenge of his owne wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honour, who stricke M. de Plessis, like 10 a Russian coming behinde him, and (hauing aduantage of companie, and his horses ready) shifted himselfe away on the suddaine, but being afterward taken, was taught to repent him (selfe in this shamefull manner; Or whether Monsieur de Plessis (of whole valour no man doubted) had not farre iust cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him; let any wise man iudge. To this if it be said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission; that his repentance was enforced and not voluntarie; and therefore no disgrace vnto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that en- 20 forced repentance is no disgrace in respect of the force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our finnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay voluntarie repentance is selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakenesse. Certainly, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride pettie iniuries or suddaine iniuries, that are not offered from malice forthought, then reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their owne valour; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleue them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselves. For he that knowes himselfe 30 indeede to be a valiant man, comes to hunt after the opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preferred; wee may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as wee doe submit our selues in all controuerfies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And 40 out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Cheualrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the blood of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth honey-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous Beast, Reuenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten vp of seuerall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatening the wrath of God vpon supreme 50 Gouvernours, than the permission.

His Majestie therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeouored) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deede in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessours could neuer doe: in beating downe, and extinguishing, that hereditarie prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power, for ever more. And we haue cause to hope, that his royall care shall be no lesse happy in preventing the like mischief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outrageous va- 50 nities of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must be added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe and vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their seuerall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise; or complementall lies; and such such pernicious lies, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excusable by weaknesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betwene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, à la parricide; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer bee drawne by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by euert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poisoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betwene committing presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, pruently, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spread before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the Kings Majestie now reigning, haue giuen notable testimonie of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talar: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporteur de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding delivered ouer into the hands of the Hang-man. Queene Marie, vpon a noble man of her owne Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Majestie, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poison, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans; euery Age hath had too many examples. Of guilefull killing by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Authour of the French Recherches giues vs two notable instances: the one of des Esbars, who (saith Pasquiere) fit mourir Montaigne grand Maître de France, pour contenter l'opinion de celui dont il estoit lors idolâtre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & estranglé; Who caused Montaigne great Master of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Esbars worshipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himselfe was soone after hanged and strangled. The other was of the Great Francis the first, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to satisfie the Kings passion, practised the destruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man most nobly descended, and of great seruice. For as in other men, so in Kings, the passion of loue growes old, and wearies out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with some offences which hee had formerly committed. The Admirall, presuming vpon the great good seruice which hee had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Mar seilles against the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him; and desired nothing so much, as a publike triall. Here vpon the King (it being easie to prouoke an ill disposition) gaue commission to the Chancellor, as President, and other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Advocate, to question the Admiralls life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conscience, (which is rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with some of the Iudges with so great cunning; with others, with so sharpe threats; and with the rest, with so faire promises; as, albeit nothing could be proued against the Admirall, worthy of the Kings displeasure; yet the Chancellor subscribed, and got others to subscribe, to the forfeiture of his Estate, Offices, and Libertie; though not able to preuaile against his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falsehood in so great a Magistrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignment, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (saith Pasquiere) à tout Iudge pour demourer toujours en soy, & ne laisser fluctuer sa conscience dedans les vagues d'une imaginaire faueur, qui pour fin de ten le submerger; & faire lesson to all Iudges, to dwell alwaies in themselves, and not to suffer their consciences to float vpon the waves of imaginaire faueur, which in the end ouerwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue bene answered answered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vnderseuered, That hee was tried, according to his owne desire, by the Lawes of his Countrie, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings iustice, surmounting all other his passions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Estate.

†. III.

The last Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is chosen Consul.

The last busines that troubled Scipio in Spaine, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerously sicke, in such sort, that the rumor of his death ranne currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettie Kings, that had forsaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio awhile before, to take armes against the Romans. They were vainely perswaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themselves should become the mightiest in all Spaine. But seeing now, that things were no way answerable to the greatnesse of their hopes; they thought it best, to take the present aduantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they rashly fell vpon the Suesetani and Seletani, Confederates of the Romans; and wasted their Countrie. Part of the Roman Armie lying at Suro, in stead of making head against these Rebels, grew to be affected with the like dis temper. They had not reaped such profit of their Roman conquests, as might satisfie their desires; or as they thought ealie to bee gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time serued very well, to enrich themselves with spoile of the Countrie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greatest of all, driving away their Colonells, that should haue bridled their furie; they chose out of their owne number two base fellows, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Vmber, to be their Commanders. These tooke vpon them all the Ensignes of Proconsuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had bene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was chosen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipios. But whilst they were deuising, what exploits they might do, for the enriching of themselves, in a time of such combustion, as was expected; there arriued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came also new Colonells, sent vnto them from their General: who mildly rebuking their want of consideration, and seeming to bee glad that they had no further ouer-shot themselves; led them to Carthage, there to recieue their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had resolved to doe exemplary iustice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deserued. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make readie the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition againe Mandonius, and Indibilis; Hee caused Albius and Atrius with some thirtie or other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; Hee called the Mutiners to assembly; and hauing them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; hee bitterly inueighed against them all, as Traitors. This done; Albius, and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were caused to take their oath of obedience anew; and recieued euerie man his pay when he was sworn.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipios life and health. Well they could haue bene contented to be quiet: but by the securitie vsed to the Roman Souldiers; they stood in feare, as being being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof hee fought with them: and sending Lelius with all his horle to fetch a compasse about the Hills, and charge them in reare; he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remaining, to persueue themselves and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly craving pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselves lesse free Princes, then they formerly had bene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masaniissa 10 who secretly promised to doe him all seruice, if the People of Rome would lend him to make Warre in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italie; and there wage an Armie of Gauls, and Ligurians, to joyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was monie sent vnto him from Carthage; and he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Towne of Gades; without sparing either priuate men, the common treasure, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, hee landed at Cartagena; hoping to haue taken it by surpris. But hee failed in the attempt; and was fo beaten to his ships, that he returned back to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoile that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not suffer him to enter againe into their Citie. By this hee foresaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, hee alured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isle and Citie of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Province, to those that were sent from Rome to succcede him therein: and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet bene granted vnto no Proconsul, excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voice of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus joyne with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Casar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office, were slayed by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the Warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to loose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the diuision of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not ca- 40 pable of employment so farre off.

Scipio obtaines leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Masaniissa who joyne with Scipio. The victories against Asdrubal and Syphax.

P V. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Crassus, entering into their Consulship, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio should bee allowed, to bestow part of the money which he had brought out of Spaine into the treasure; vpon the setting forth of solemne plaies, that he had vowed to make, 10 whilest he was busied in his Spanish warres. This helped well to reuieue the memorie of his victories already gotten; and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the same purpose, did the Spanish embassages auail much in the Senate, especially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions, highly and deservingly; saying, That they were the most happie of all their Countymen, since they being present, had seene him chosen Consul, and should carry home such joyfull newes. The Saguntine Embassadors were lovingly entertained by the Senate; as their faith to Rome, though costly it were both to them, and to the Romans, had well deserved. Neuertheless, when Scipio 20 proposed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Province: there wanted not many, euen of the principall men, that vehemently gainesaid him. Of these was Q. Fabius Maximus, the chiefe: who seemed to haue been troubled with that dislike; which too often causeth men renowned for long approved vertue, to looke asquint vpon the actions of those, that follow them in the same kinde. Hee alleged many reasons against the purpose of the Consul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treasure was vnable to sustaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard so great forces, where they could not at pleasure be recalled vnto the defence of Rome it selfe, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italie stood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago 30 his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as also concerning the honour of the Consul; which would (he said) be greater in setting Italie free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to elucate the Spanish warres, as of lesse moment than the intended voiage against Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing suffered Asdrubal to passe into Italie: shewing, that it was greatly to be feared, lest the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithstanding the good successe of Scipio (if it hapned to bee good) might be sent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilst the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which he vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yere 40 a Province: which the Consul neuertheless propounded in such wise, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other side, insisted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offensive, than a defensive warre: especially against such as the Carthaginians; who being ill provided of able men at home, did furnish themselves by helpe of money, with leues made abroad. As for the care of Italie, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would bee as well able to discharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promising to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his owne home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which withstood such a gallant enterprise; he proposed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: so far as much as it was noyced abroad, that if he could not 50 bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who resented in this honourable man a little spice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in those that had commanded long abroad. But in conclusion, Scipio referred himselfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleasure; whereby hee obtained thus much, That the Isle of Sicill might be appointed vnto him for his Province; with leaue to passe ouer into Africke, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furnish out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africke. Here-withall it fell out, that Atigo, comming on the suddaine from the Baleares to Genoa, and winning the Towne, bred a feare of no lesse terrible inuasion vpon Italie, than that which Asdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raise any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them distracted with ciuill warres. Therefore he was drun to make choice of his partie; and to helpe those whom hee thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly haue spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the vntowardie Gauls readie to enter into his pay. Hereupon the disperfed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay readie to be employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Alago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet, either comming to his aide from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) laden with the bootie that he had taken; fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that gouerned in Sardinia. This did much displease him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, heartning him in his proceedings; yet some impediments which he found, and that fatal voyage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him be recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue bene pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, where hee raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greeke letters. Such account of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesnesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of dejection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, infelling both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to haue bene the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse, which fell not our much amiss for the Citie of Rome, that was maruailously empouerished by this warre; and had already tried the utmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie, it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargain, that the Citie might receive no lesse than the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was hee allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did hee ouer-much labour to obtaine it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselves; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is vsually found in Councells of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carrie all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne iudgements, to the wisdom that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, hee that repose himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe deceived: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-ruay the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time; for his warie nature sorted well with the businesse, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fuluius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne olde in following one course, from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, he had from diuers parts of Italie about seven thousand Voluntaries. Hee had also prouision from the leuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for sailes, Axes, Beede-hooks, Hand-mills, and the like implements, furre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmes, and Spears of all kinds: eury place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afford. Vnto this willingness of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of lue and fortie daies, hee had both feld his Timber, built, and lanced twentie Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith hee transported his Armie into Sicill. In Sicill he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Canna: which were olde Souldiers, and (as hee himselfe well knew) not guiltie of the overthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauie censure. They had serued vnder Marcellus and Laetius, at the taking of many Cities, and strong peeces: in which regard, they were like to be of good vnto him in Africke, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horie, hee pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthie young men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterwards discharged from the Warre, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they should deliuer their Horie and Armes, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilest hee was prouiding, to haue things in a readinesse for Africke, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recouer their Citie. Some handicrafts men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadells of Leori (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, and rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadell was surprized. The other Citadell was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Townesmen were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Citadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians vnto the Roman Senate; not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other Villanies: the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoiled by these barbarous Thieues. The Locrians therefore aduised the Senate to make present amends to the Goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had neuer been committed, without notorious vengeance by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good care to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the injuries done vnto them, sent for Pleminius, with other principall offenders, whom they cast into prison, & vled according to their deserts: as also they rellorred vnto Proserpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Leori; and had not carefully harkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these wicked courses. By the sharp inuective that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speak what they pleased, as well against the demeanor of Scipio, as against the dissolutenesse of his Armie, which lay, as they said, idle in Sicill, neither mindfull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if neede should require. Finally, things were so farre vrged, that ten Legates were sent ouer into Sicill, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ediles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italie, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they halsted him on his journey, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Lutius in Africa; rather to make discouerie, than to worke any other great effect of warre. He tooke a great bootie: and truck no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who law their affaires to bee vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his journey was, That speaking with Masanissa, he will informed him selfe of the state of Africa; and knew what was to bee expected of those two Kings, that had promised to ioyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his reuolt from the Carthaginians; and his compact made 10 vnder-hand with the Romans: Luie doth proteste, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferior to Luie, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe; that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Luie; if it had beene true: vlesse we should beleue, that he wilfully forbore to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amiss of Scipio. How soeuer it was, thus Appian tells it; and many 20 circumstances of things done confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisio, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa loued. Masanissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly gentle man of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to be his sonne-in-law. When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great seruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Asdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and bestowed her vpon Syphax; without standing to acquaint her father or Masanissa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mightie Prince; and for that the indignitie of the repulse, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Masanissa was aduertised: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, secretly as he 30 thought; yet not so secretly, but that some notice was taken of it: which would haue cost him his life, had he not with great circumspection conueighed himselfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things past, and following. Only it seemes, that how soeuer Sophonisba the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: yet since this their courtellie proceeded from feare, He thought it wisdom to continue and increase the same: their feare, by making faire promises to the Romans; vntill

Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the warre it selfe, wherein Appian differs much from Luie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works 40 remaining) Luie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Masanissa was the sonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended by order of the Country, vnto Deufales the brother, not vnto Masanissa the sonne. But this Vncle of Masanissa shortly died: and his elder sonne, who tooke possession of the Kingdome, was vanquished, and slaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himselfe Protector ouer the younger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himselfe against Masanissa, whose returne hee feared; by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serue: He, and his Pupil, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanissa; that was a skillfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason should haue bene 50 glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable seruice, was done vnto him; whilst his Estate: had they not bene guiltie of the iniurie by them done vnto him; whilst his Vncle or Cousin reigned, and hee seemed vnlike to stand them in any need. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his owne malice towards his Cornuall, warred warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheless Masanissa still retayned the hearts of his people: and thereby remained strong enough, to infect both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distresse, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syrtis, betwene the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrie, euen as farre as to Hippo; and when Lutius arriued thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the inuasion of Africa.

10 But Syphax, in whose great aide and succour was reposed more hope of good success, than could be expected from the good will of poore Masanissa; sent an Embassage into Sicily about the same time, which was little pleasing vnto Scipio. He excused himselfe of his promise lately made; and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That hee could not choosie but fight for the defence of Africa, wherein he was borne and reigned; and for defence of his beloued wifes Countrie, if it were invaded. Neuertheless hee promised to remaine a Neuter; so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held warre abroad, farre enough from Africa; as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his Expedition, much more than any perswasion could haue done. For the promised assistance of Syphax had not a 20 little aduanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardesse of many Aduenturers. Left therefore the fayling of this hope, should worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the best way to preuent all discouers, and set the warre vnder taken immediately on foot. The Embassadors hee dismissed in all haste, with letters to their King: wherein hee willed him to consider, that what hee had promised hee had also sworne; and therefore should doe well to make it good. Having sent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make ready for the voyage; which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, said he; Masanissa hath bene with Lutius: and Syphax hath newly sent to me; greatly wondering vpon what I should thus stay; and saying, that they will 30 prouide for themselves, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else haue bene made concerning the message of these Embassadors; whose followers had bene scene walking vp and downe Syracuse. And lest any thing should afterwards breake out; that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet vnto Lilybeum: and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Pretor in Sicily, to meete him there; halsted thither with his Armie. At Lilybeum hee agreed with the Pretor, about the diuision of the Legions betwene them; which to leaue behinde for defence of the Iland; and which to carrie with him into Africa. What numbers hee transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twentie 40 hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirtie thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I holde it needlesse to set them downe: since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither he, when hee tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occasions, haue omitted; they being also word for word set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Luie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Armie landed in Africa, neare vnto a Fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the 50 Compass, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The coming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arriuall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinke the faire Promontorie to haue bene the same, that was also called Mercuries Cape, since with little difficultie Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syrus, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment, soone after his arrival, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that flood Weltward from Carthage beyond the Riuer Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo, whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proued; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, nine hundred horse to trouble him in his disembarking. Neither was it so hard for Masaniissa, that routed about the Countrey with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which hee vifually resorted, like as before he had met with Lalius at Hippo that was farther off: as it would haue bene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouer-come the trouble of a long iourney, and fetch a great compass to Vtica, by Land; when he might haue disembarked nearer vnto it. Neuerthelesse it may passe as a conjecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syrus; since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the letting forth from Lilybæum, to shapeth their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustentance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masaniissa had signified vnto Lalius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoeuer they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at hand. But when hee saw their fleet and Armie to be such, as not only serued to invade the Lands of Carthage, but also threatned a conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might hee better aduise them to set saile for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuied, or to be leuied in haste. Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, the same that had lately bene chased out of Spain by Scipio, was their best man of warre. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whose faction he was: or it ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him passeable. He was at that present with the King his sonne-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Inuasion: entreating the one of them to giue assistance; and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where he was choſen Generall. But ere these could be readie, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which hee conueighed aboard his Hulks or ships of burden, and sent them backe loaden into Sicily. Hee tooke likewise a Towne called Salera; which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thousand Numiſian horse: whose seruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places; made Scipio to perceiue the vnskillfulness of their Leader, that had thus bouſed them. Wherefore he sent Masaniissa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a Brauto, trained out the improuident Hanno so farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was easily gotten; and Hanno either taken, or slaine. With those that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the Towne; which presently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a Citie of great importance, * of which mention hath bene formerly made; and fate downe before it. Fortie dayes he spent about it: assailing it both by Land and Sea, and vsing all his engines of batterie whereof he had plenty; yet was in no likelihood of preuailling. And now the Summer was quite spent: so that it was time for him to chooſe a place, and fortifie his Winter-campe; which must be well forced against the yeere following. Whilest thus necessitie vrged him to leaue Vtica; and shame of taking the repulse in his first great enterprize, rather than any hope of better successe, caused him to flay there: Asdrubal and Syphax gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the siege. Asdrubal had made a Leuie of thistle about a thousand foot, and three thousand horse; yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Armie to draw neere vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage thie thousand foot, and tenn thousand horse: which joyning vnto the forces of Asdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who there by tooke occasion to disloge. He chose for his Winter-campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Naue. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, joyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horse-men he bestowed vpon lower ground, on the other shore: in the bottome of the Creeke he moored his ships; and there hee quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vnto the fleet. The whole Campe he strongly fortified; and so attended the season of the yeere, when it should serue him againe to fight. O cattale and other bootie Masaniissa had brought in great stores; by drining the Countrey, before the coming of Asdrubal and Syphax. Come also he had gotten some; and great store was sent him from Sicily and Sardinia. Likewise apprell for his Souldiers, was sent from home, or from Sardinia: though scarce enough to serue turne; for that it was a matter of more cost. The ships that brought these things, he freighted homewards with such part of his bootie, as hee could best spare; especially with Captiues to be sold for slaves. Asdrubal and Syphax encamped neere vnto Scipio: so strongly fortifying themselves, as did the Romans; either for that they wanted the secure initiation, which the Romans vied in discipline of Warre; or for that they presumed vpon their multitude, against which they found in Scipio no disposition to assue tooth of his strength, and fight. So the Winter passed without action.

miſian* King, if perhaps he might bee wonne by perswasions to forsake the Carthaginians. It was considered, that those Barbarians were naturally vnconstant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen proofe of before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore be hoped, That hauing wearied himselfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peradventure no lesse wearie with fardie of his wife, who had caused him to enter into this warre: Hee might bee moued with a little entreatie to with-draw himselfe home into his Kingdome, and rest a Nether. But it is not vnlikely, that such a friend as this King, had bene highly entertained and honored in the Citie of Carthage, which was neere at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleased him, or as he had bene invited, to make a stop thither and repose himselfe a while; his wife Queene Sophonisba lying also there at the same time, to cherish him in his resolution. Howsoeuer it were, Syphax did only make an ouerture of peace; propounding it as reasonable, That Annibal should bee recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like sort should quietly depart out of Africk; and so make an end of the Warre, wherewith now both Africk and Europe were disquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the first giue care: yet being pressed earnestly by many messages from Syphax, and desiring to continue the inter-courte of Embassadors: He beganne to make these, as if he would consider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderstand by those whom he had sent vnto the King, That the Enemies had their Campes without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabins, and covered with boughes: and that the Nu-miſians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vied coverings of Mats and Reedes; others, that camelater, had chatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leanes: vnder which they lay carefully without their Trenches. Vpon this advertisement he bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to set their camps on fire; and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, Hee foresaw that it would be a worke of great difficultie for him, to proceede in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrey wherein hee lay; and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be refitted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter; the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt upon their Campe. To this end he sent many Embassadors, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeede of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surpris. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandering (as it were) idly vp and downe the Campe, might obscure the waies and entrances, with whatsoeuer else was needfull. When hee had learned as much as hee desired: vpon the sudden hee sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as hee could not get the consent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off: Asdrubal and Syphax were very peniue; as hauing lately perswaded themselves, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they beganne to deuise, by what arte they might draw Scipio out of his campe; and prouoke him to battaile in those Plains. This it they could doe; they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusal of peace, as did M. Attius alter the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches: what else remained than to besiege him; which they themselves were well able to doe by Land; and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making readie for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselves; 20 recompensing in conceit the losse of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extremely and worthily disappointed: for that, consulting about the future, they provided not against present danger; but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, hee was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as if were to doe somewhat against Pica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made readie; and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon hee lay against Pica before. This he did, partly to keepe secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it; partly to hinder those of Pica from setting vpon the few, that hee purposed to leaue behinde him in 30 his campe. He caused his men that night to suppe well and betimes; that they might be readie for the iourne. After supper, he appointed such Companies as he thought fit, vnto the defence of his Campe; all the rest of his Armie he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seuen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his armie; the other halfe he committed vnto Lelius and Masaniissa, whom hee sent before him to set vpon the Campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualtie vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in that que Syphax warning to looke vnto himselfe. 40 acted as the doing of enemies; and gae Syphax warning to looke vnto himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and softly; that Lelius and Masaniissa, who had a longer iourne, and were to fetch a compasse about for feare of being discouered, might haue time to get before him, and doe their feat. It was about two or three of the clock in the morning, when the campe of Syphax beganne to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himselfe, imputed vnto casualtie; as thinking themselves safe enough from Enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betwene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe; and others, that had sitten vp late at drinking; ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But such was the tumult, that they neither could 50 rightly vnderstand in what case they were; nor giue remedie to the mischance, as it was supposed. Many were smothered, and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the sudden mischance, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that escaped the

the fire, fell vpon the Enemies sword, which was readie to receiue them. Especially Masaniissa, that be it knew the Countrey, did great execution vpon them; hauing laid all the waies, by which he forelaw that they would seeke to escape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittifull mischance: so that some ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians; carrying only what would serue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart: where, fearelesse of any danger towards themselves, they stood beholding the greatnesse of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would haue it. Hee therefore lost no time: but setting vpon those that were running towards the Numidians, 10 he killed some, and pursued the rest back into their campe; which in a litle while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Asdrubal seeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not stand to make resistance, but (slighted onely for himselfe, and escaped with a few of his horse about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had bene taken in such a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hannus would haue judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then haue been said, that with lesse than one halfe of thirtie thousand men, hee might at least haue giuen some bad recompence, to them that were taking paines in kindling the fires, had he not bene only carefull how to saue his owne fearful head. Neuertheless 20 Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is most likely to haue bene true, That if Asdrubal, Except. Vol. 1.14. or any of those about him, would haue shruen to shew valour, when the campe was once on fire: He should not thereby haue done any manner of good, because of the tumult and contention. I shall not neede to tell what a fearful thing it was, to heare the cries of so many thousands that perished by fire and sword, or to behold the cruell flame that consumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath be- 30 ing is able to describe. It is enough to say, That of those many thousands very few did escape; which accompanied Asdrubal and Syphax in their feuerall waies of flight. Besides these also there were some scatterers, especially of the Numidians, that saued themselves in the darke: but they were not many; as after shall appeare. Surely it must needs haue bene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwise made 30 away; and what numbers escaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Luius, who in the rest of this Relation, as often elsewhere, doth follow Polybius, may seeme to haue followed some lesse wor: by Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in calling vp the summe. For hee reckons onely two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, to haue escaped; fortie thousand to haue perished by sword or fire; and about fixe thousand to haue bene taken prisoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre short of fourscore and thirteene thousand, which were in these two Campes.

Asdrubal, putting himselfe into the next Towne that was very strongly fortified; thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good 40 sure might repaire their Armie. He had with him no more than two thousand foot, and five hundred horse: which he thought sufficient to defend the Towne; if the Townsmen would not be wanting to themselves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earnest in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Vnto this disputation, hee well forelaw that the arriuall of Scipio would soone giue an end. Wherefore, lest they should lay hold vpon him, and seeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; He shrunke away betimes, and made all harte to Carthage. As for the Towne, which hee left, it opened the gates to Scipio, at his first coming: and thereby preferred it selfe from all manner of losse. The two next 50 Townes adioyning would needs bee valiant, and make countenance of warre: but their strength not being answerable, they were soone taken by Scipio; who abandoned them to the pleasure of his Souldiers. This done, hee returned to the siege of Pica.

The Carthaginians were sore troubled, as they had good reason; when, in stead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of such a lamentable lamentable ouerthrow. Necessitie enforced them to make hastie prouision for the future: but how to doe it, few of them saw any meanes. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to send for Hannibal out of Italie; but the most, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithstanding the losse of this Armie, they might well defend themselves against the Romans, by rayling new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leaue them. It was therefore concluded. That they should bend all their care this way, leuying in, all haste another Armie; and sending Embassadors to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their unfortunate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Gisco, was employed to make new leuies of men: and Queene Sophonisba went forth with Embassadors to her husband Syphax; who hauing gathered together as many as he could of his subjects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne Kingdome. Sophonisba laboured so with her husband, that at length the wonne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to serue in Africk. Of these were made such braue reports; as if their courage, and the armes which they vsed, were not to be resisted. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleeeued these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, since in one Age, the whole Countrie of Spain had bene twice conquered: first, by the Carthaginians themselves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embassadors helped with a lie; saying, that there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirte daies they made vp an Armie, consisting well-near of thirtie thousand men; reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians, in the number. So they encamped in a Region called the great fields, about fise daies iourne from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leauing behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Armie; to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three daies after the meeting of both Armies, passed away in skirmish; without any great thing done. It had now bene time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to weare out the Enemy by delaies. But either (which is likely) he was a faire worse Commander, or else it was not in his power to giue such directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile: wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner; hauing their Italian horse in the right wing; and Masaniissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrarie side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the Battaille. The victorie was gotten without many blowes: for the vntrained followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustain the first charge of the Italians, or of Masaniissa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time, euen till they were all in a manner slain: rather as men desperat, and not hoping for mercie, since they were thus come ouer to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserued of them; than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their oblinacy was beneficiall vnto those that fled; for that it hindered the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal, and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home, to his owne Kingdome: whether his wife was either gone before, or immediatly followed him.

Scipio, hauing thus gotten the matter of the field, tooke counsaile about the prosecution of the Warre. It was resolu'd vpon as the best course, That hee himselfe, with part of the Armie, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masaniissa, with his Numidians, and Lelius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdome, where easily else hee might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice it seemes that Masaniissa gaue: who knew best the qualitie of the Numidians; and and what good might bee done among them, by the reputation of a victorie. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne Kingdome, vsurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Lelius was sent away with Masaniissa: and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the warre from Towne to Towne. Many places yielded for feare: many were taken by force: and all the subjects of Carthage wauered in their fidelitie, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid vpon them for maintenance of the warre in Spain and Italie. What to doe in this case the

Carthaginians could hardly resolute. Fortune was their Enemy: they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who neuertheless of their owne free will were likely to giue little helpe. Very much it grieved them, to send for Hannibal out of Italie: yet since there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Armie; it was decreed, that Embassadors should bee forthwith sent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to set out a fleet against that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and easie to be taken, whilst Scipio himselfe was busied in the Inland Countreies. Some were of opinion, That it should be their principall care, to fortifie by all meanes the Citie of Carthage: vpon the safetie whereof they said that all depended; adding, that whilst they were true, and at vnitie among themselves, they might well enough subsist, and expect those opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtlesse) would present them. These counsailes were not rejected: but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning defence of the Citie, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheless it was considered, that hereby they should onely protract the warre: without any way advancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victorie; no, though it should fall out, that all the shippes at Vtica might be taken or destroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That he should immediatly come ouer into Africk, as the last refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no sooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themselves to the execution of that which was decreed: some, to fortification of the Towne: some, to make readie the Fleet; and some, appointed thereunto, forthwith to imbarque themselves for Italie. In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a Citie in those daies very strong, and standing in prospect almost of euery part of Carthage. Thither hee, or rather some defensible piece adjoining, he easily tooke; the Garrison forsaking it, and running away as soone as he drew nere. But whilst hee was about there to incampe, and fortifie himselfe against the Citie, He might perceiue the Carthaginian fleet setting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceiued: and stood in great feare, lest his owne shippes, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heauily laden with engines of batterie, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most conuenient for assailing the Towne) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that speciall seruice. Wherefore hee hastied away towards Vtica, to assit with his presence in this needfull case. It fell out well, that hee had sent his carriages, and all the great bootie which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should haue come too late. Neither could hee decide haue bene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vsed such diligence as was conuenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Vtica, they tarried awhile to make a brado; presenting themselves in order of battaile, as if the Romans would haue put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: He thought it would be sufficient, if hee could preferre his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their brauerie at Sea; it should little auail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole Estate by Land. Wherefore hee took his shippes of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge over the Channell of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thousand of his choice men, with store of Darts and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some open spaces hee left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessells, might runne out and back againe vpon any aduantage or neede: but these he covered with planks; vsing the masts and yards of his ships in stead of rafters, to joyne all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge itselfe not be torne asunder. Scarce was this worke finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Hauen. The fight betweene them and the Romans, that were in the Hulkes, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood vpon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards toward their whole strength and violence, which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vnleadey, could not doe. But the Roman Frigots and long Boats, aduenturing forth from behinde the Bridge, were greatly ouer-borne by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small losse which followed. They that stood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them: nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting these their friends, that were entangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hookes, hanging at Iron chaines. These they threw vpon the masts and yards which serued as Arches to joyne the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder; in such sort that one ship followed another, and all the first ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to save themselves as hastily as they could, by shifing into the next ranke of ships, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious worke; but having baled away sixe ships of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater then their victorie: because among so many grieuous losses, onely this exploit had succeeded well; though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Carthage, Lalius and Masanissa, in their iourne against Syphax, found as good successe as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten, restored Masanissa to his Kingdome, without further contention: 30 the Masafisi, his subjects, joyfully receiuing him; and forsaking the Vsurper. But here they stayed not: neither indeede would Syphax permit them to be quiet. Hee had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and, therefore being solicited by Asdrubal and Sophonisba, hee prepared againe for warre. But beside the instigation of his beloued wife; the losse of the Masafisi would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lalius and Masanissa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no lesse vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance: but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in possession; be the title vnto some part neuer so vnjust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which 40 thought that hee had vomited vp her owne guts, when it was onely the garbage of some other fowle, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleued the Kingdome of the Masafisi to be part of his entrailes: Lalius and Masanissa will shortly giue him somewhat, that shall make him calke his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so farre. It concerned the Romans to dispossesse (if it might be) that King: whose false and hollow friendship towards them, had beene converted into strong enmitie; as also to set in his place another, who might doe them such good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How easily this might be effected, Masanissa knew best: as being well acquainted with the nature of those Countries; wherein, even to this day, though there be many strong Townes, yet the fortune of a battell is enough, to translate the Kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came against them with no lesse an Armie, than his former, and marshalled in the Roman order; according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman

Centurion,

Centurion, long agoe sent vnto him out of Spaine (on Cn. Scipio). But though hee could teach his men how to march in order; yet could hee not teach them to fight courageously. They were a rabble of all sorts, gathered vp in haite; and few of them had scene warre before. Encamping neare vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that some small Troupes of Horse on both sides, encountered one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worst, were seconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the skirmish, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: so that at length Syphax, vnwilling to dishearten his men by taking any foile at their first meeting with the Enemy, came vp with all his Horse, which 10 were the best part of his forces, and therewith ouercharged Masanissa, whose numbers were farre lesse. But whilest he was prosecuting his hope of victorie: some Roman Squadrons of Foot came against him through their owne Troupes of Horse, which fell to the sides, and made a lane for them. So their Battail standing now more firme, than a little before; Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much in vaine, to make them giue ground. Masanissa likewise, and his Troupes, grew confident vpon this assistance: and charging afresh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, caused him to giue backe. Herewithall the Legions came in fight: which terrified so the Numidian Horse, that they beganne presently to disband. Faine would Syphax haue stayed them from flight: and to that end made head in person 20 against the Romans; with hope, that his men would be ashamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnhappy, that he was cast from his Horse, which receiued a wound; and so taken prisoner. Of others that were slaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It sufficed, that they forooke the place, and fled: and that their King, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Masanissa told Lalius, That this victorie should make an end of the Numidian warre, if presently they hasted away to Cirta: the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome; whither hee himselfe desired to bee sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lalius agreed. Masanissa coming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arrived, called out the chiefe of the Citie to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but 30 specially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he prevailed so far, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one strove to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queene Sophonisba yielded her selfe into his hands: and vehemently besought him, that shee might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beautie, so commended her suit, that Masanissa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Lalius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his wife. But Lalius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously; so that at first he would haue baled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-entreated by Masanissa, he 40 suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom hee sent away Syphax and other Captiues immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needfull in the Kingdome.

At the coming of Syphax there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mightie Armies which he had lately brought into the field: and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together sought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune; ministering to euery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not only to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon 50 them, vnprovoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe: calling her a Furie, and a pestilent creature: and saying, That Masanissa was no wifer than himselfe; since hee had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and

stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as shee had done of Syphax. It was not long ere Masanissa and Lalius came vnto him: both of whom together hee louingly welcommed; and highly commended in publique, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had title to her head; and that she was a milchicuous enemy of theirs. Wherefore hee entreated him to moderate his afflictions: and not to deface the memorie of his great seruices already done; (for which he should be highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masanissa bluieth, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio; whom hee neuertheless 10 entreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that she should not be deliuered into the Roman power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after some time spent in agonie, he called vnto him a seruant of his that had the custodie of his poison (which Princes then vsed to haue in readines, against all mishances that might make them vnwilling to liue); and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this message; That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeild thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preferre her from falling aloue into the handes of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe. 20

At the recit of this Message and Present, shee onely said, That if her Husband had no better token to send vnto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might haue died more honourably, if shee had not wedded so lately before her Funerall. And here withall shee boldly dranke off the poison. Thus Luie reports. But Appian varies from this; and lets it downe agreeably to that which hath bene spoken before, concerning the pracontract betwene Masanissa and Sophonisba. Hee saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadors from Cirta met with Lalius and Masanissa vpon their way thither, yeelding vp their Citie, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne priuate, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax; as made against her will, by compulsion of those in 30 whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse; and accepted her to wile. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne; and challenged her, as a part of the bootie belonging to the Romans. Masanissa said, she was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeares before. But Scipio would not heare of this: or if it were true; yet he said it was no reason, that Masanissa should keepe her in possession, as long as it was disputable, vnto whom she might appertaine. Wherefore he willed him first of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claime vnto her; wherein he should haue no wrong. Here withall he sent to fetch her away: 40 and Masanissa accompanied the messengers, as it were to deliuer her; but making her acquainted with the necessity, gaue vnto her a cup of poison, wherewith shee ended her life, before they came that should haue apprehended her. So hee shewed vnto the Romans her dead bodie; which he royally entered. The sudden violence of Masanissa his loue, and the readie consent of Sophonisba to marrie with him; adde not so much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other euident cause (which Luie notes) of the sudden falling out betwene him and the Carthaginians; vnder whom he had bin trained vp, & done them great seruice. Howseuer it were: Scipio, hearing of this tragick accident, sent for Masanissa, and comforted him as well as he could; lest his melancholic should lead him to some inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his rashnesse, he brought him forth in presence of the Armie; where extolling his noble acts, and shewing how highly he had deserued of the Citie of Rome, he proclaimed him King; and gaue vnto 50 to him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the readie way to diuert his thoughts from the sadde remembrance of that which was past, vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that beganne to smile vpon him.

This was the first time that the Romans tooke vpon them to create or proclaime a King. Which honour though Masanissa well deserued; yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither should hee haue bene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recovered possession of his Countrey, together with the greatest part of Syphax his Dominions. It seemes not vnlike 10 lie, that had he remained a Neuter in these warres, and sustained himselfe with his Troupe of Horse, in such sort as hee did before the coming of the Romans; hee might neuertheless haue recovered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne subiects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice bene vanquished. As for the enlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than hee deserued: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they haue wished a fitter opportunitie, than of such a man, vpon whom to bestow it that was their assured friend, and passable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Masasyls were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberallie of the Romans, was noyled abroad as very glorious; and the Romans themselves, in a politicke sort of grauitie, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen 20 their saluting him by the name of King, had bene a matter of great consequence. Hee thrived indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, encroaching vpon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereto they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Perminia the sonne of Syphax (of whom wee shall shortly speake more) which held some piece of his Fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all means to deserue their loue, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of suit: yet the Roman Senate was punitious herein; and answered very grauely, That 30 it was not their custome to giue the honour of that appellation, save onely vnto such Kings, as had greatly deserued of their Citie. Thus they made it a matter of State; and in proceesse of time grew so proud of this their imaginarie prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the consultation by that name; though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or profit thence redounding. §. XIX.

The Carthaginians desire Truce: and breake it.

THe Carthaginians were extremely dismayed, when they heard of the great calamitie, that was befalling their good friend Syphax; and vnderstood that Masanissa, the ir mortall enemy, had got possession of his Kingdome. To increase their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their Citie: where hee made an end of that Fortification, which hee had begunne at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts lo failed them, that they sent forth vnto them thirtie Embassadors, Princes of the Citie, which were their 50 Priue Councell, to make suit for peace. The being admitted into the presence of Scipio did not only prostrate them/clues on the ground; but kissed the feet of him, and of those that sat in Councell with him.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed feſſed themſelves to haue vniuſſly broken the Peace betwene them and Rome; and to haue deſerued whatſoeuer puniſhment it ſhould pleaſe the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly beſought Scipio and the reſt, that in common regard of thoſe miſfortunes, whereto all men are ſubiect, they would ſhew mercie vnto the Citie of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a Monument of their clemencie; which, by the ſollie of her Citizens, had now twice deſerued to be ouerthrowne. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begonne the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that theſe Embaſſadors were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hannos and the choiſe of his companie; who had now their long deſired worke in hand, of ſuing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatſoeuer they were, it muſt needs be that they were moſt insolent men ouer thoſe that were ſubiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made ſuch adoration vnto the Romans, in their owne neceſſitie; vnleſſe they themſelves had expected the like, where they had the advantage.

It was not vnknewne to Scipio, or to his aſſiſtants, in what poore caſe the Citie of Rome then was; and how vnable to deſraie the charges of continuing the warre. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the loſſe of ſo many Armies, in ſuch ill caſe, as the Romans themſelves had very lately bene. For they had monie enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre ſtronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman reſolution: and therefore diſtruſted the walls of Carthage; though Ptolemy, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out againſt Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Armie, though ſo often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their ſubmiſſion, and told them, That though he came into Aſſyria, to make a Conqueſt, and not a Peace; yet hauing the Conqueſt as it were in his hand, hee would not denie to grant them the Peace, which they deſired; for thereby ſhould all Nations vnderſtand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of iuſtice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The conditions which he impoſed vpon them, were theſe: That they ſhould render vnto him all priſoners that they had taken, together with all Renegado's and fugitiue ſlaues: That they ſhould withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaul: That they ſhould not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any Iland between Italy & Aſſyria: That they ſhould deliuer vp all their ſhips of warre, ſaue twentie; and That they ſhould pay a great ſumme of monie, with certaine hundred thouſand buſhels of Wheat and Barlie. To conſider of theſe Articles, hee gaue them three dayes: and when they had approued them, hee granted a Truce; that they might ſend Embaſſadors vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masaniſſa was diſmiſſed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the warre had bene already at an end. Syphax was a little before ſent with Lelius vnto Rome: where the fame of theſe victories filled men with ioy; and gaue hope, that the long endured miſeries would be ſhortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were fet open, and an holy day appointed for thankſgiving and ſupplication to their Gods. Lelius was accompanied with Embaſſadors from King Masaniſſa: who gratulating the happie ſucceſſe of the Romans in their African Warre, and giuing thanks vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Maſter, made request for the Numidians, ſuch as were now his ſubiects and priſoners in Rome, that they might be beſtowed vpon him; who by rendering them to libertie, ſhould doe an act very pleaſurable, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behinde with Masaniſſa in complement: but ſhewing themſelves to be highly pleaſed with all that Scipio had done, and ſhould doe for him; they called him King againe; releaſed his Numidians that were captiues; and ſent him two purple Caſſocks, that had each of them one gold button; with ſuch other Preſents, as in time of their pouerty might ſerue to reſtiſie their good will.

will. Scarcely were theſe and Lelius gone from Rome; when the newes came, that Embaſſadors from Carthage were arrived to deſire peace. Theſe Embaſſadors were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: vntill Lelius being ſent for, came backe from Oſſus, to bee preſent when their demands were to bee heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of Bellona; that ſtood in the ſuburbs. The errand of theſe Embaſſadors, was Peace: but the meaning of them and of their Citie, was onely to winne time, and get reſpite from warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago ſhould come out of Italy, either to chace the Romans out of Aſſyria; or to obtaine peace for Carthage, by terror of their great names and Armies, vpon more eaſie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle diſcourſe of the League, that was concluded betwene them and Lutetius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they ſaid, all things well conſidered, did ſtill remaine in force: neither had there ſince bene any warre at all, betwene the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leave from Carthage, had of his owne head beſieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum; and after that aduentured in like ſort, without Commiſſion, to paſſe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being ſo: their Meſſage was none other, than to deſire, that the League before ſpoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter ſtand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cauſe to wonder at this tale; hearing theſe Embaſſadors make (as it were) a jeſt of a warre, that had bene ſo terrible. Wherefore they aſked them a great many queſtions, concerning that Peace made by Lutetius, and other paſſages following betwene the two Cities. But they excuſed themſelves by their age: (for they were all yong men) and ſaid, That thoſe things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but colluſion, and that they fought no other than to gaine time; vntill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were ſent home in companie of Lelius; without any conſeſſion at all of peace; and, in effect, without anſwere. This notwithstanding, we finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiuing aduertiment from Scipio, of that which had paſſed betwene him and the Carthaginians in this

10 Treatie of peace, approued the conditions by him propounded; and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceede vnto conſeſſion. This may with good reaſon bee beleued: ſince it was not vnknewne, that if the warre continued, all theſe goodly hopes muſt reſt vpon the moſt vncertaine iſſue of one battaile betwene Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune ſhould beauerſe to them, their forces in Aſſyria were no better than quite loſt.

Matters thus hanging in ſuſpence, before the Carthaginian Embaſſadors came backe from Rome: a Fleet out of Sicily, wherein were two hundred ſhips of burden, and thirtie Gallies, being bound for Aſſyria to victualle the Roman Campe, was overtaken by ſoule weather at Sea; and hardly eſcaping wracke, was diſperſed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as we finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage: which cauſed the people to crie out vpon their Magiſtrates, that they ſhould not let ſuch a booteie eſcape them; ſaying, that the danger of famine was greater and worſe, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were ſo that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedie deſires: the multitude in Carthage vnderſtood (as it ſeemes) that all this diſcouſe of peace in hand, was no better than meere mockerie; and therefore cared not for obſervation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewiſe in Alexandria, for all the Racaſitie, together with women and boyes, to be meddling in vprores: the clamours of the boyes being in ſuch tumults no leſſe violent, than of the men. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if little regard were had of reaſon, or of honour, in any ſuch commotion. A Fleet was ſent out vnder Aſdrubal, to gather vp the diſperſed Roman ſhips of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recouered the ſtation whereto their Campe adioyned) and bring them into Carthage: which was done. Scipio was herest much offended: not only for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby releued; but for that by this breach of truce, he foresaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadors vnto them: both to require satisfaction for the iniurie done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the peace; vpon those conditions which hee had propounded. But (said they) *we hold it strange, That yee, who so lately haue call your selues to the ground before vs, and kissed our feet, after an vnusuall manner of humilitie, confessing your selues to haue perfiously broken the league that was betwene vs, and thereby to haue deserued such punishment as is due vnto Rebels; should so soone forget what yee then vttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which yee acknowledged your selues worthe to be destroyed, hauing only recourse vnto our mercie. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in HANNIBAL that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that yee should consider, how long hee hath bene pent up in a corner of Italie, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner besieged, and unable to stirre: so that yee are like to finde his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it bee supposed, that he were now in Africke, and ready to giue vs battaile; yet should it well agree with your wisdom, to doubt what might befall, remembering that he is a man, and not invincible. Now if it should happen that he were overcome; what refuse haue yee left vnto your selues against hereafter? What gods will yee either sweare by, to bee beleued, or call vpon in your miserie? What wordes, and lamentable gesture will yee henceforth vse, to moue compassion? Surely yee haue already wasted all your forces of perswasion, and shall not againe deceiue vs, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at the present ye are capable. It is no maruell though the Carthaginians were angrie, when they heard themselves vbraided with the base demeanour of their Embassadors. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselves: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that 30 the Roman Embassadors were very much delighted, in the rehearfall of that point which was yeelded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iustice of the quarrell. But the Carthaginians tooke this in so ill part, that hardly they could reframe from doing violence vnto the men, who had vied vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the furie of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian (I know not why) calls Hanno the great; or by the very recurrence, due vnto the place of those that had vttered such liberrall words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, though it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two Gallies appointed for their safe Conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men failed from 40 Carthage towards Vtica. Hee, whether onely desirous to please the Multitude, of whose disposition he was informed; or whether directed by publike order, to cut off these Embassadors in their way homeward: lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good Voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had bene then in safety; since the Roman Campe was euen in sight. The Embassadors tooke this in ill part; not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them in such manner, as they might well so discern his purpose; which was to haue stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal; they slippt away, and made him ouer-thoot himselfe. Yet he gaue them chase; and had well-nere surprisid them. But they discouered some* Roman Companies on the shore ouer against them, and therefore aduentured to run their vessell aground: whereby they saued their owne liues; though a great part of their companie were slaine, or hurt. This practise of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartened in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might be driuen to studie nothing else, than how to get the victorie, as hauing no other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for peace, would also haue caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not bene giuen to vnderstand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what sort HANNIBAL spent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of MAGO in Italie. HANNIBAL and MAGO called out of Italie. How the Romans were diuersly affected by HANNIBALS departure.

Ver since the losse of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians; waiting for another supplie from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded vnto Clauus and Linus, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slaine, were contented to bee quiet all their yeare. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthe of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindered by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Consul who followed Licinius, and Cn. Seruius Capius, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to haue done somewhat; but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some, the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preclude his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of worke in hand, that their chiefe enemy was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Africk, wherein they were at no smal charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happie conclusion. They stood neuertheless in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paine among the Ligurians and Gauls to raise an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italie, that beganne to waxe colde. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians; and found them so ready to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Countrey strong, it might haue proued no lesse needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to employ one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gauls; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago; when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the Countrey of the Insubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varus one of the Prators. With these hee fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe worthe of his father and brethren; yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull;

full; in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to haue 'haken the Enemies to peeces. The Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout: and strained themselves hard; as if at that brunt the victorie should haue beene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the seruice of those beaſts being fitter for such vic, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field; their Riders being vnable to manage them. Hereby the *Numidian*s got aduantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more available against those that were loofe, than against the Troupes that were close and thick. Then set the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a shoure of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest to giue backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemy; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago employed some of his Gauls, whom hee had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gauls discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off; and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrink, hee put himselfe in the head of his 20 Armie; and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retreat, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length he received a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. He was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the rest of them, after little further resistance, provided euery one for himselfe: So the Romans obtained victorie, not without great cost; as purchasing the death of about five thousand enemies, with the losse of two thousand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, besides those that dyed of the Proconsuls Legions; also besides diuers Colonells, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this horrible peeces of seruice. Neither were there any prisoners taken; whereby it may seeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered some ground that might assure them from pursuit. 30 How euer it were, this victorie would haue much imported for the assurance of Italie, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted these valiant sonnes of Aenobar to abide therein. But Mago with drawing himselfe (by easie iournies, because of his wound) into Liguria, found thre Embassadors from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderstand the pleasure of their Citie, which was, That both he and Hannibal should presently repaire home with all their forces; not staying any longer to thinke vpon the conquest of Italie, since Carthage it selfe was ready to bee lost. He obeyed this Commandement, and embarked shortly his Armie; but dyed of this wound about Sardinia, in the way homeward.

About the same time Hannibal receiued the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnashing his teeth, and groining, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were ready to burst out, whilst the Embassadors were deliuering their errand. When their message was done; hee told them, That this was yet plaine dealing. For, said he, They that now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their best to hale mee out of Italie; though more closely and crookedly they went to worke, by stopping the supply, that should haue enabled mee to manage the Warre here. So 10 therefore shall not neede to bragge, that hee hath drayne me home by the beeles: it is HANNIBAL, that hath wrought this noble feat, and overwhelmed the House of the Barchins, for lacke of other meanes to doe it, with the wine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readinesse doubting that which after came to passe: wherein he embarked, besides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that shrunke backe from him, and refused to doe seruice in this Expedition: of whom such as hee could take take he flew; not sparing those that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lucina, which had been held an inuiolable Sanctuarie vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly transported with rage; and departed out of Italie no lesse passionate, than men are wont to bee, when they leaue their owne Countreies to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the shore: accusing both gods and men; and cursing his owne dulnesse, in that he had not led his Armie from Cannæ, horte and blouded as it was, directly vnto the wals of Rome. With such vexation of spirit hee quitted the possession of Italie; wherein he had liued almost halfe his time.

If it could haue beene foretold vnto the Romans, in the first beginning of this 10 war, with what exceeding joy in times following they should entertaine the newes of Hannibal's departure out of Italie: they would (I thinke) lesse earnestly haue pressed the Carthaginians to send him ouer thither. When sure aduertisement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holiday was appointed for thanksgitiuing vnto their gods; and extraordinary great sacrifices publicly made, for joy of such happie tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did still remaine the same, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal, at his coming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had beene troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Countreie, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of strangers. 20 The remove of the warre from their owne doores, and the conceit of that victorie for which they hoped; was enough to make them presume further, than at other times they would haue done. When therefore the Saguntine Embassadors brought vnto them a great masse of Golde and Siluer, together with some Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: onely the Carthaginian prisoners were accepted; the treasure was rendred backe vnto the Saguntines that had surprised it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a litle before this, order was taken for the repayment of those monies, that had beene borrowed in time of more necessitie from priuate men. Hence also proceeded the seuer chastisement, laid vpon those twelue Colonies, that for want eyther of meanes, or of good will, had refused to giue aid to the 30 Romans. They were commanded, and enforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had beene wont to set out for the warres, with a proportion of Horse answerable to the verie most of their abilitie. So confident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet futable to the greatnesse of their spirit) vpon the good successe of the Battaille at Metanum; and the hopes which they reposed in Scipio. All this notwithstanding, when they considered more nerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italie had beene few dayes since discharged, was landed safe in Africk: they began to reuolue a thousand fearefull matters in their heads, and to stand in doubt, lest Q. Fabius (who died about the same time) would bee found a true Prophet. For be- 40 thinking themselves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories against Syphax and Asdrubal no specialitie of such great worth, as might promise the like successe against another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were either of those two. The Numidian King had beene wont to bring into the field a rallall multitude of halfe-killions, that were good for nothing; being himselfe a fit Captaine for such souldiors. Likewise Asdrubal, the sonne of Gisco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwise one, that in the field was onely good at sauing himselfe by a swift retreat. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their child-hood with incredible patience, rested many hundred times in Roman bloud, 50 and wearing the spoiles not onely of good souldiors, but of braue Captaines, by them slaine. Such talke vsed the people of Rome, saying, That Scipio was like to meet in battaille, with many that had slaine Roman Prætors, yea and Consuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had beene first in getting ouer the Trenches of seuerall Roman Campes, or in winning the tops of wals at the siege of Townes; briefly, that that he should now bee opposed by an Armie, as good as had euer serued in warre, and following the dreadfull Name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

HANNIBAL in Africk prepares to fight with SCIPIO; treats with him about peace in vaine; loseth a battaile at Nadagara, and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

HANNIBAL disembarked his Armie at Leptis, almost an hundred miles from Carthage, Eastward from the Headland of Mercure, and somewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horse, which it was not easie for him to transport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, somewhat farre from the Enemy; that hee might furnish himselfe with this and the like needfull helpes, against the day of battaile. From Leptis he passed on to Adrumetum, and so along through the Inland Countrie; gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tycheus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was said to haue in those dayes the best Horses of seruice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie: making him vnderstand, that if the Romans got the victorie, it should be easie for Masanissa, by their countenance and helpe to oppress both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindred his prospect. This Argument, and the fame of him that vsed it, prevailed with Tycheus; who shortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thousand Horse. Appian further adds, That Meczelinus, (the same who had made himselfe Protector ouer Masanissa his Cousins; and was Head of a Family, and aduerser to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought vnto Hannibal another thousand Horse: as likewise that Vermina the sonne of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdome, began at the same time to assaile the places that yielded obedience to Masanissa. This Vermina, as we finde in Liuius, came with more than sixteene thousand men (for he lost more than so manie) to succour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in such hard estate, or (at least) so impatient of the state wherein they were; that they could not attend the leisure of those preparations, which would haue made the victorie assured. When they considered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatnesse of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene so base, as to make humble suit vnto the Romans for Peace; whilst they had such a braue Champion alieue, to maintaine their cause by warre. But when they bethought themselves of their owne sufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeede they were: then cried they out earnestly, that it was no time to linger, but presently to fight; that so they might see an end of these troubles, either good or bad. And to this purpose, they sent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made answer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to dispose of him and his Armie: but since he was General of their forces, He thought it reasonable, that they should suffer him to doe as a General ought to doe; and to choose his owne times. Neuertheless, to giue them satisfaction, He made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his 50 Embassadors: and the newes of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to vnderstand the resolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yield vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themselves, as long as they were able to make resistance. Wherefore hee sent vnto Masanissa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with speed, and lay all other bulesse a-part. Ten Roman Companies, of Horse and Foot together, Masanissa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him seruice in the establishing and enlarging of his Kingdome. But he well vnderstood, that those and many more belides all his owne forces would little auail him; if Hannibal should driue the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking such order as hee could vpon the sudden, for the sake of his owne Kingdome; with foure thousand Horse, and sixe thousand Foot, hee made all haile vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of these new troubles, the Carthaginian Embassadors 10 that had beene at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Leilius and Fulcius; who brought them safe into the Roman Campe. There when they arrived, and vnderstood what had lately passed, especially how then Citizens had behaued themselves towards the Roman Embassadors: they made little doubt, how their owne heads should answer for such notorious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion.

Attilius one of the late Embassadors that had beene in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Campe, laid hands vpon them, and detained them; sending word vnto his General, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Countrie, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might bee repaid in 20 their owne Coyne, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to heare of this; and commanded Attilius to vie them with all possible courtelie, and send them safe home. By thus doing He brake the hearts of his Enemies; and caused them to acknowledge themselves, (which was a great victorie) farre lesse honourable than the Romans. This notwithstanding, He made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to sacke, without hearkning to any Composition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Towne by assault, to put all that came in their way to the sword, whatsoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themselves terrible: and the better to worke such impression in the mindes of those, with whom they 30 had to doe, they vsed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beasts, that ranne athwart them in the streets; hewing their bodies alunder, as men delighted in shedding of blood. This being their practise at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no peece of crueltie; when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengefull mindes, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were so earnest in pressing Hannibal to fight.

Hannibal being encamped at Zama, sent forth his Scouts and Spies, to discouer where the Romans lay; what they were doing; and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of these were taken, and brought vnto Scipio: who in stead of trusting them vp, gaue them free leave to view his Campe at pleasure; appointing one 40 to conduct them vp and downe, and shew them whatsoever they desired. This done, He gaue them libertie to depart; and sent them away safe vnto their General. Hannibal vnderstanding this, admired the brauerie and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the sudden he grew desirous to haue an Enter-view, and personall conference; and signified so much vnto him, by a messenger sent of purpose. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned answer, that Hee would meet him shortly in place conuenient. The next day Masanissa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remoued vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neare vnto which hee lay 50 downe, in a place otherwise commodious, and close by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence he sent word vnto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly serue, if He had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, and came within foure miles of the Enemy: where hee encamped well to his owne good liking in all things else; excepting that his men were drawn to take much paines, in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting: and the two Generals, each of them with a troupe of Horse,

Excerpt 2 p. 45, lib. 10.

Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a peece of ground; which was before well searched, for feare of ambush. There they will their followers to stand off: and themselves, with each of them one Interpreter, encountered each other in the mid-way betwene their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then beganne the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had bene better both for Carthage and for Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africke and of Italie; for that the Countreys of Sicil and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselves had striven, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had bene lost, and of so much blood as had bene shed, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not bee recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, vnto what extreme dangers their owne Cities had bene exposed, by the greedie desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length, to make an end of their obdurate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisdom hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition He affirmed that his owne yeares, and long trial of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience might rather fixe his minde vpon vn certaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutabilitie, whereto all humane affaires are subiect. Yet (said He) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same HANNIBAL, who after my victorie at Cannae wonne the greatest part of Italie: and denised with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome; which I hoped verily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your wailes, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand here entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes instabilitie. I fought with thy father, Scipio: Hee was the first of the Roman Generals, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke; that the time would come, that I should haue such businesse, as now at the present, with his Sonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pageants, whereof shee hath many. And thou must haue experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how soone? Thinke vpon M. ATTILIVS. If hee would haue hearkened vnto such persuasions, as I now use to thee; hee might haue returned home to Rome an happy man. And so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will give thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicil, Sardinia, and whatsoeuer Islands else are situate betwene Italie and Africke, be abandoned by the Carthaginians for euer; and left vnto the Romans, to beare Dominion therein? Thou shalt haue glorie enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of such a bargain. As for vs: our owne quiet shall henceforth give vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully observe the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to pander well how great an hazard and thou must vndergoe, for the obtaining of a very little more, than that which thou must haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay holde vpon good Fortune, if it please thee: stay but till to morrow night; and thou must take such fortune, as it shall please the gods. The issue of battaile is vn certaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and Steele we shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victorie, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more adoe, make peace. And doe not tell me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: it is I HANNIBAL that now desire peace with thee, which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrey. And thinking it expedient, I will alwayes maintaine it: like as I haue maintained vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie mee, the Warre by me begunne. Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicil and in Spaine, which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former Warre: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the final issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to bee most iust. As for the mutabilitie of Fortune: he said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that with-

out any note of insolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all these Countreys, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already wonne from them by the Romans? If, said He, these Conditions had bene propounded whilest as yet wee detained some part of Italie, they might peraduenture not haue bene reiected. But as the case now stand, I see no reason, why I should remit vnto you any one peece of those my former demands; to which the Carthaginians haue yielded already, and thought mee to deale graciously in being so moderate. Rather I say, that the iniuries which they haue done me since, haue made them vnworthie of obtaining peace vpon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, HANNIBAL, though thou wouldst be glad to make thy Citizens vnderstand, from how much of their burden they are by thy meanes eased. Onely thou must thinke, that in like sort it concerns me in honour, not to let them be gainers or losers by the wrongs which they haue done of late. Thou knowest well, that, besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore vnto vs some-free all prisoners that they haue of ours; to pay vs five thousand Talents; to deliuer up their Cities; and to deliuer hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce; their spoiling of our Fleet; and their violating our Embassadors? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides al this, to make such an end as I shall require, for the injuries newly done: then will I take aduice with my Council what an answer to give you; otherwise, you may euen prepare for warre, and blame you 20 owne fautes, for that I haue denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell between Rome and Carthage. The next morning at brake of day they issued into the field; a notable Match, and such as hath very seldom bene found; whether we regard the Generals; their Armies; the two Cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Habstaty, diuided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betwene them: Not farre behind thes followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Triarij. But herein 30 Scipio altered a little the ordinarie custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes oppositely vnto the void Spaces between the Habstaty, that so the Habstaty, as was vsuall, might fall backe betwene the Principes; but hee placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This Hee did because of the Elephants; whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whilest there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee tooke such order, that when they had passed through the spaces between the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Vates or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, Hee gaue direction, that when they found themselves ouer-charged, eyther by the Enemies; or (which was most to bee feared) 40 by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betwene the Maniples; and that those which were swift, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behind all their owne Armie; thereby leaving roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behinde, to saue themselves on the void ground; that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third Battalies, without cloying vp the way betwene the Maniples, which hee desired to keepe open. His Italian Horse hee placed in the left wing vnder C. Lelius. In the right wing was Masaniissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vnto words not many, but verie forcible. He bade them remember what they had achieved, since their coming 50 into Africke. He told them, That if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victorie in this warre, should make them Lords of all the World; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary; if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would fly. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neyther was there any place in

Ccccc

Africk,

As if, that would giue them shelter; if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but Death or Victory: vnlesse they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercilesse Enemies. In such necessitie, he said, that they which consider themselves to be, and take resolution answerable thereunto, haue neuer bene knowne to faile of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourecore, in Front of his Battaile. Next behind these, he made his Vanguard all of Mercenaries; Ligurians, Gaules, Balears, and Moors. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more interested in the quarrell than were those Mercenaries; though not so good fouldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want 10 of courage, they had with them foure thousand Macedonians, lately sent from King Philip. More than the space of a furlong behind these came his Rereward, consisting of those braue Souldiers which had serued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he reposed any confidence. Opposite to Lalius, in his owne right wing he bestowed the Carthaginian Horle. Tychæus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing against Masanißa. He was indeede farre too weake for the Enemy in Horle, both in number and in goodnesse. For Tychæus and Mexetallus had no more than three thousand; and those not so well exercised, as were the foure thousand of Masanißa. The Carthaginians also were no more, nor none other than such as could be leuiued in the harts of a few dayes; and the remainder of those, that 20 had of late bene often vanquished, and accustomed to fly. But it was no time for Hannibal, neyther had hee perhaps authoritie, to make these his companions alight and serue on foote, setting better men in their saddles. All that he could haue done, was to stay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermis the sonne of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with sixteene thousand and upwards, the most of them Horle: the advantage of number might haue serued well to supply all other defect. Yet since the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal must beaine to comfort himselfe, with the hope that hee reposed in his old Italian Souldiers; whose vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more strongly opposed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their severall 30 conditions: promising vnto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards: threatening the Carthaginians with ineuitable seruitude, if they lost that day; but especially animating his old fellow-souldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained against farre greater numbers. He bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an estimate, whether they were any thing like so many, as that huge Armie which they had slaughtered at Canna. He willed them to remember, that it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had first of all compelled to runne away. He told them, that these Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the most part of them, the very work of the Romane Souldiers; euen such, as for their dastardly flight out of sundry battailes, could no longer be trusted to beare Armes in their owne 40 Countrey. As for the rest: they were yong men, the sonnnes of Cowards, and bred vp in the continuall feare of those weapons, by which their fathers were daily slaine or chased. Wherefore he entreated these his old companions, vpon whose vertue he meant wholly to repose himselfe, that they would this day strue to make good their honour; and to purchase the fame of men invincibles.

Such exhortations vied the two Generalls before the fight. When they drew neare together: the Numidian Horlmen on both sides beganne to skirmish. The Trumpets, and other instruments of warre, sounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romane. Of these Elephants (as they were alwayes an vncertaine kinde of helpe) those that stood neere vnto the point of 50 the left wing, turned backe for feare: and ranne vpon their owne Numidian Horle; which they affrighted and disordered. Masanißa espying this, gaue charge vpon the same Numidians; and not suffering them to retie themselves, drew them quite out of the field. The rest of those beasts made a great spoile of the Romane Velites, whom they

they followed into the spaces betweene the Maniples: but without any harme to the Battalions themselves; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Diuers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed: but ranne backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they disordered the Carthaginian Horle which were in that wing: against whom they gaue to Lalius the same advantage, that Masanißa had against the Numidians; which hee vied in like sort. In the meane while, the Battels of foote advanced, and drew neere together with a slow and stately pace, till they were almost within a weapons cast: at what 10 time they gaue a shout, and ranne one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time seemed both in audacitie, and in quicknesse, to haue the better of the Romanes; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Romane discipline after a while, prevailed against the boisterous violence of these vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hasatry, encouraged their fellows; and shewed themselves readie, if neede were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries received no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leuiued Carthaginians and Africans, when they saw their hired fouldiers giue backe, did also themselves retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gaules, and the rest, to thinke 20 themselves betrayed: whereupon they inclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retreat; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romanes, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellows, to turne their Armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Romane Hasatry in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng, had their hands so full of worke; that the Principes were laine to come vp 30 vnto them, and helpe to ouer-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themselves. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindring one another could neither fight, nor easily flye. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or saue these Romane awaies. He caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would haue rushed vpon him: whom hee thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaile, and saue themselves in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romanes were now to march, ere they could meete with Hannibal, was couered with such thicke heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slippery with blood: that Scipio began to stand 40 in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should be dissolved in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Armie, which he saw before him, remaying yet entire, and without teare expecting him; He might be well assured to receiue a notable overthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hasatry to make a stand there where they were, opposite vnto the maine battaile of the Hanniballians. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triary: Hee placed them, when they had ouercome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hasatry, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer he had bene receiued in his life before. All the dayes vnto ke till now, seemed to haue bene onely a matter of paltime; in regard of the sharpe 50 Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romanes were encouraged, by their hauing prevailed all the day before: They were also farre the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; and (perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foote; but rather chose to die vpon the ground, whereon he stood. So that, after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worfe: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romanes were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of Masaniſſa and Lelius from pursuit of the Enemies Horſe, is ſaid to haue bene moſt happye and in a needfull time. Theſe vpon the ſudden charged the Hanniballians in Rere; and ouer-bearing them by mere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaille there dyed of the Romanes ſitene hundred and vpwads: on the Carthaginian ſide, aboue twentie thouſand, beſides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captaine of the Adacechians was one. The ſingular ſkill that Hannibal ſhewed in this his laſt fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Linte reports, by Scipio himſelfe. But the Enemies were too ſtrong 10 for him in Horſe; and being enioyned, as hee was, by the State of Carthage to take battaille with ſuch diſadvantage, he could worke no maruells. He ſaued himſelfe with a few Horſe; and ſtayed not in his journey, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he ſent for to Carthage; from which he had bene abſent ſixe and thirtie yeares. At his coming into the Senate He ſaid plainly: That there was none other way left, than to take ſuch peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians, not knowing what other conſeque to take, reſolved to ſend Embaſſadours againe; and trie the fauour of Scipio, whoſe Armes they could not now reſiſt.

Scipio hauing ſpoiled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where hee found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with ſixtie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this Fleet, and that which hee had before, Hee thought it beſt to make towards Carthage: rather of purpoſe to terrifie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed vnto Cn. Octauius; whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then ſending Lelius away to Rome with newes of the victorie, He ſet ſaile from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountered on the way by ten Embaſſadours from the Citie: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, beganne to vie the pittifull geſture of ſuppliants. But they receiued none other anſwer, than that they ſhould meet him at Tunes, where He would giue them audience. So rowing along before the Citie: and viewing it more in brauerie, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned backe to Vtica, and called backe Octauius thither, with whom 30 in perſon Hee ſet forwards to Tunes. As they were in their iourne thither, they heard the newes, that Vermine the ſonne of Syphax, was coming with an Armie of more Horſe than Foot, to the ſuccour of thoſe that were already vanquiſhed. This Vermine ſeemes to haue bene both careleſſe of getting intelligence how things paſſed, and very defectiue in all other duties requiſite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman Foot, with all their power of Horſe, was ſent againſt him: which did not onely beat him, but ſo compaſſe him in, that hee hardly eſcaped himſelfe with a few; leauing ſitene thouſand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken priſoners. If this good companie had bene with Hannibal at Nadagara, they ſhould haue bene farre better conducted, and might well haue changed 40 the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian loſt, by default of Horſe. But God had otherwiſe determined. It is not to bee doubted, that this victorie, though it were no great acceſſe vnto the former; yet ſerued well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirtie Embaſſadours from Carthage: whoſe behauiour though it was more pittifull than it had bene before; yet procured it leſſe commiſeration, by reaſon of their late falſe dealing, after they had in like ſort humbled themſelues. Neuertheleſſe it was conſidered, what a long and laborious worke it would proue, to beſiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio ſtood in great doubt, leſt the honor of this warre, if it were protracted, ſhould bee taken out of his handes; and giuen to 50 one of the Conſuls. Cn. Seruilus Cæpio, that Conſul who had charge of the warre againſt Hannibal, at ſuch time as he departed out of Italie: was bold to paſſe ouer into the Ile of Sicill (as it were in chace of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpoſe thence to haue proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the Command

mand of the Armie there. But a Dictator was choſen of purpoſe, to reſtraine the ambition of this Conſul Seruilus. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made ſuite for the ſame Province of Africk: and was therein ſo earneſt, that though neyther the Senate, nor People, would grant him his deſire; yet hee needed would be going, procuring onely leaue of the Senate, that hee being Conſul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere Hee could haue his Fleete and all things in a readineſſe for the journey, wherein no man cared tr further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely toitt at Sea with ſoule weather, firſt vpon the Coaſt of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Conſullſhip 10 expired, and ſo he returned home a priuate mar. Then came the joyfull newes to Rome, of the victorie obtained againſt Hannibal, and that the warre was now euen at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Conſul fo pationate, in deſiring Africk for his Province, That hee ſaid hee would ſuffer nothing to paſſe in the Senate, untill hee had firſt his will. Much adoe there was about this; and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the People, at laſt it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it ſhould be granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio ſhould haue command therein by Land, and the Conſul at Sea. The ambition of theſe men, cauſed Scipio to giue the more fauourable anſwere vnto the Carthaginian Embaſſadours. Hee willed them to conſider what they had deſerued: and in regard 20 thereof to thinke themſelues well dealt withall, in that hee was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Gouer-nour ouer them, or Garriſon to hold them in ſubiection; leauing alſo vnto them their poſſeſſions in Africk, ſuch as they were at the beginning of this warre. As touching the reſt hee was at a point, That, before hee cyther granted them Peace or truce, they ſhould make ſatisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whileſt the late T reatic was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee That immediately they ſhould deliuer vp vnto the Romanes all Priſoners, Fugitives, and Renegados, that they had of theirs: likewiſe all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they ſhould make no warre at all thence forth out of Africk, neither 30 yet within Africk, without licence of the Romanes: That the Countreys, Townes, goods whatſoeuer, belonging any wiſe vnto MA SANIſſA, or to any of his Anceſſors, which were in their poſſeſſion, ſhould be all by them reſtored vnto him: That they ſhould ſinde corne for the Romane Armie, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded: That they ſhould pay ten thouſand Talents of Siluer, in the terme of fifty yeares, by two hundred Talents a yeare; and that for obſeruance of Conditions, they ſhould giue an hundred hoſtages, ſuch as Scipio would chooſe, being none of them vnder foure-ſcene yeares of age, nor aboue thirtie.

With theſe conditions the Embaſſadours returned home; and reported them vn-to the Citie. They were verie vnpleaſing; and therefore one Gyſo ſtood vp to ſpeake 40 againſt them: and exhorted the People, who gaue good attention, that they ſhould not condeſcend vnto ſuch intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude; was bold to pull him downe from his ſtanding, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured; as if their common libertie were too much wronged, by ſuch inſolence of this preſumptuous Capitaine. Which Hannibal perceiving, roſe vp and ſpake vnto them: ſaying, That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwiſe than the cuſtomes of the Citie would allow; for- 50 asmuch as he had bene thence abſent euer ſince he was a Boy of nine yeares old, vntill he was now a man of ſixe and forty. Hauing thus excuſed himſelfe of the diſorder, He diſcourſed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perſwaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themſelues; had the demands of the Enemy bene yet more rigorous. Finally vpon good aduice, they reſolved to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they payed out of hand ſixe and twentie thouſand pound weight of Siluer, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them

done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall Hee gaue injunction, that they should neither in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismisle any Embassadours to them sent; without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honorable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious Counsailes. Asdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassadours they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They 10 went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours; who related vnto the Senate and People these joyfull newes. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to wait awhile for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Princes of them, and the new Prators. Then were the Macedonian Embassadours called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romanes had lately signified vnto their King that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame vpon those Greekes themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they M. Aurelius: who being one 20 of the three Embassadours, that had lately bene sent from Rome vnto King Philip, 20 tarried in Greece behinde his fellows; and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betwene him and the Romanes. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sepater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countreymen, that had lately serued Hannibal for Pay, and being taken Prisoners in Africk, were kept in bonds by Scipio; might be released, and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharpe answer. Hee said, that the Greekes which were confederate with Rome, endured so many iniuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to flay behinde, to help them as he might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiection. As for Sepater: He affirmed him to be one 30 of the Kings Counsaile, and verie inward with him; one that serued not for money, but carried money with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadours could make vnto the Senate no good answer: they were willing to returne, and tell their Master, That warre hee fought, and warre hee should finde, if hee proceeded as hee had begunne. For in two maine points Hee had broken the League, that was betwene him and the Romanes: first, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that hee had ayded their Enemies against them with men and money.

These quarrells with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Easterne Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their sollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Asdrubal about the rest was much respected, as one, whose good offices had kept the Romanes from necessitie of sending Embassadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the iustice of the quarrell had bene wholly on the Romanes side; saying that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the Citie; that had bene too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsaile. But if Hanno and himselfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euen at the best of their Fortune, should haue granted the peace which they now desired. Herewithall hee commended the moderation of the Romanes, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwaies they had bene victorious. To the same effect spake therest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuersitie of their stile. They had patience enough enough to endure such reproofe of Perjurie, as they themselves might haue laid vpon the Romanes; if their diligence and fortune had bene such as the Romanes was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would sweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Asdrubal made answer; Euen by the same gods, that are so seuer vnto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Consul interposing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto conclusion of peace; for that hereby Hee was like to lose the honour, which he purposed to get by making warre in Africk. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom rested the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with ten Delegates sent vnto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embassadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might visite their Countreymen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranfome and carrie home with them some, that were their especiall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almost two hundred names. Wherevpon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadours would chooseth, should be sent out into Africk, and be freely restored to liberty 20 bertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leaue, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commission.

At their coming into Africk, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuersie or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegados, were deliuered vnto Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegados, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon those of the Romanes, than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines hee beheaded: the Romanes hee crucified. About the first payment of their money; the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasurie could 30 haue spared two hundred Talents for the present: yet since the pension was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeares; it was thought meete to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collecting of the summe there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Romane yoke had begunne to pinch them; so as many, euen of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which when hee was checked by Asdrubal Hedus and tolde, That it woud of all bestem him to laugh, since hee had bene the cause why all others did weepe; Hee answered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but sometime from extremitie of indignation. Yet said Hee, My laughter is more reasonable, and lesse 40 absurd, than your teares. For yee should haue wept, when yee gaue up your Shippes and Elephants, and when yee bound your owne hands from the vse of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romanes first obtained. This miserable condition keeps vs vnder; and holds vs in assured seruitude. But of these matters yee had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purses, yee haue therof some sence. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein yee shall acknowledge, That it was the very least part of your miserie, for which yee haue shed these teares. Thus discoursed Hannibal vnto those, who talking the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their owne disorders, which had bred this grievous dilemma, accused that Physicion, whose noble endeauours had bene employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio being to take leaue of Africk, produced Masaniissa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vnderferred. To him also hee assigned out those Townes of King Sphax, which the Romanes at that present held: wherein, to lay truth, he gaue him but his due; and that which otherwise hee knew not well how to bestow. But the loue of the Romanes, and friendship of

Scipio,

Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deferuings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romanes embarked themselves for Sicily: where when they arrived at Lilybaeum, Scipio with some part of his Armie tooke his way home to Rome by land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no lesse glorious than any Triumph: all the people thronging out of the Townes and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. He entered the Citie in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in brauery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph; and died soone after in prison: or whether he were dead awhile before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be auowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romanes, to insult ouer the calamities of mightie Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had alwaies made haire and courteous warre. But hereof we shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that gricuous warre past, whereof the Romanes had bene in a manner without hope, that euer they should set Italy free. This made them looke cheerefully vpon the Author of so great a conuerſion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: filling him by the name of that Province which he had subdued. This honorable kind of surname, taken from a conquered Province, grew after wards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselves the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

Of Philip the father of Perseus, King of Macedon; His first Acts and warre with the Romans, by whom he was subdued.

§. I.

How the Romans grew acquainted in the East Countries, and desirous of warre there. The beginning of many Princes, with great warres, at one time. The Ætolians ouerran Peloponnesus. Philip and his Associates make war against the Ætolians. Alteration of the State in Sparta. The Ætolians invade Greece and Macedon, and are invaded at home by Philip.

Of the great similitude found in worldly euents, the limitation of matter hath bene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subject that is not vnbounded; the workes of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependance vpon the will of man, we are lesse to wonder, if we find lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious vnto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundrie men are o-

uer-ruled, in manning the affaires of our daily life. It may bee obserued in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdom of the Medes, with two hundred thousand foote and three score thousand horſe: but sayling in their intended conquest, they became subject within a while themselves vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with such numbers of men, as might haue seemed reſiſſible. But after that the Persians were beaten home, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes: who at all times of leisure from intestine warre deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old ſouldiours, had vnder taken the Medes; or Cyrus with his well trayned Armie, had made the attempt vpon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, haue bene farre different. Yet would it then haue bene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people; that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their owne. For the menacing wordes vsed by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kind it may bee, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so auailable to victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kicked by the Aſſe. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by miſſe-vnderſtanding the language of Fame: and deſpiſing the vertue that makes little noiſe, adventure to prouoke it against themselves; as if it were not poſſible that their owne glory ſhould be ſoyled by any of leſſe-noted excellence. Against the ſame ſtone, wherewith Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Eulmerodach, had ſtumbled; Pyrrius the Epirus had dalli his foot. Hee was not indeed the King of all Greece; though moſt of marke, and a better ſouldiour than any other Greekish King, when he entred into war against the Romans. This war he vnderooke as it were for his mindes ſake: hauing received no iniurie; but hoping by the glory of this name, and of the Greekes that ſerued vnder him, to preuaile ſo eaſily againſt the barbarous Romans, that they ſhould onely ſerue as a ſtep to his further intended conquests, of Sicily and Aſſyria. But when the Romans, by their victory againſt Pyrrius, had found their owne vertue to bee of richer metall, than was the more ſhining valour of the Greekes; then did all the brauery of the Epirus (his Elephants and whatſoeuer elſe had ſerued to make him terrible) ſerue onely to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselves. For ſince they had overcome the beſt Warriour in Greece, euen Him; that, being beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himſelfe Lord of Greece and Macedon; what ſhould ſlander them from the conquest of all thoſe vnwarlike Provinces, which in compaſſe of twelue yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requiſite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion by ſome good meanes, the whole Country of Greece: all the reſt, this done, would follow of it ſelfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had ſhewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the firſt Punic war was ended, which followed ſoone after the wars of Pyrrius and of the Tarentines; then were the Romans at good leiſure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occaſion, that ſhould bee on that ſide preſented. They had alſo then a ſtrong Fleet; and were become, though not otherwiſe very ſkilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wiſhed, that the Illyrian Queene Tenta made at the ſame time cruell warre vpon the Greekes: waſting their Country, and ſacking their Townes, only becauſe they were vnable to reſiſt, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were deſirous to enter; the Queene was not flow to giue them cauſe. And their happy accompliſhing of that war which they made with

* The King of Spaine pretended imvincible Nauie, being beaten out of the Britiſh ſea; and vsed vs to thoſe of Spaine; and hauing broken the great Fleet that euer the Spaniards gathered together; we neuer made account of any of his preparations after that time.

c. lib. 5. ch. 2.

Her,

Her, was, in their owne opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the loue of Greece they had vnderaken this Illyrian warre. This began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indifference of King Philip the Macedonian; whose businesse with them being now the subject of our storie, it meett that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions.

It was like to proue a busie time in the world, when, within the space of foure yeares, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and three of them yong boyes, in three of the greatest Kingdomes. This happened on the third yeare of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolemie Philopator succeeded in the Kingdome of Egypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being sixteene or seuentene yeares old, receiued the Kingdome of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achaens and most of the Greekes; by the decease of his Vncle Antigonus Isidoron, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedamon, and the Countries about Mount Taurus. For Antiochus then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himselfe King ouer the Lacedemonians, whose Common-weale, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achaeus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebell vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeares of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out betwixt Rome and Carthage; and that Annibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans finde them out.

Philip, loone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaens, and many others his dependants. That Country, hauing freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should haue beene to the Spartans; and therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Ætolians, who despised euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. These Ætolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians: that were their owne Clients, and excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, then it was vniust: whereby with greater ease they made spoile of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaens, were called by the Messenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly; because the Ætolians passing without leaue through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Olde Stratus could ill abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the injuries, wherewith most vngratefully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Achaens. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that hee could hardly endure to stay a few dayes vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Achaens for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage; and he shewed himselfe a man firmer (as hath beene already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a great part of the Countrey, wherein he might easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recovered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie.

So

So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achaens; they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Ætolians inuaded Peloponnesus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulfe of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. There ioyned with them in this their second Inuasion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of warre vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seeke aduentures againe, and did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of chap. 3. §. 1.

10 the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell vpon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Aegean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaidas, or Scordiletus, hauing gotten what they could else where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater haucke in the Countrey now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedie reuenge: 20 there were that vrged to haue some grieuous punishment laid vpon the Lacedemonians: who were thought vnder-hand to haue fauoured the Ætolians, in mere despite of the Achaens and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately beene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedemonians had beene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arriuall of Philip, they sue such friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to iudgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Armie: since their Towne was lately much disquieted with ciuill discord, which they hoped soone to appease, and meant alwayes to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that 30 he (or rather old Stratus, who then wholly gouerned him) did misse vnderhand the Lacedemonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achaens, Boeotians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Ætolians: and desiring to haue warre decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Ætolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whither it pleased him to come or send, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue bene there at the day.

40 But when the Ætolians vnderstood this for certainie, they aduised the Councell vnto a further time: saying, That such weightie matters ought not to be handled, sine in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open warre was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had deserved it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Inuasions made on Peloponnesus; and the onely man, in a fort, vpon whom they must haue laid the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifted it from the publike.

50 After this, Philip went into Macedon: where he prepared bully for the warre against the yeeres following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promises: whom he easily won from the Ætolian side, forasmuch as the Ætolians had coufused him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaens, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countrey, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedemonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce warre vnto the Ætolians; without staying (as it were) to await the euent. Hereunto they receiued

For Antiochus then beganne his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycus found means to make himselfe King ouer the Lacedamonians, whose Common-weale, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achæus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebel vnto him, occupied the Regions neare vnto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeares of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out betwene Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeede the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolemie, and the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans finde them out.

Philip, loone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achaens, and many others his dependants. That Country, hauing freed it selfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes: was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should haue bene to the Spartans; and therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Ætolians, who despised euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. These Ætolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted to any other Art, than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians: that were their owne Clients, and excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinitie (the only good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus). Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, then it was vnjust: whereby with greater ease they made spoile of the Country; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achaens, were called by the Messenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly; because the Ætolians passing without leaue through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Olde Aratus could ill abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembering the iniuries, wherewith most vngratefully they had required no small benefits done to them by the Achaens. He was therefore so hasty to fall vpon this their Armie, that hee could hardly endure to stay a few dayes vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Achaens for the yeare following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath bene already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a great part of the Countre, wherein he might easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neare, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie.

So

So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achaens; they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacie. Shortly after, the Ætolians inuaded Peloponnesus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulfe of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. There ioyned with them in this their second Inuasion a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of warre vnto the Coast of Greece; made bold to seeke aduentures againe, and did great mischiefe. Cimerius Pharus, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians; who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdome, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell vpon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Ægean Sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaides, or Scerdilaetes, hauing gotten what they could else-where by roving at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater haucke in the Countre now, than in their former Expedition; and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made vnto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselves with some speedy reuenge: there were that vrged to haue some grieuous punishment laid vpon the Lacedamonians: who were thought vnder-hand to haue fauoured the Ætolians, in mere despight of the Achaens and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately bene subdued. It is true, that the Lacedamonians had bene so affected; and (which was worse) at the arriual of Philip, they sue such friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to iudgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Armie: since their Towne was lately much disquieted with ciuill discord, which they hoped soone to appeale, and meant alwayes to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did misse vnderstand the Lacedamonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadours of the Achaens, Boeotians, Phocians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining vpon the Ætolians: and desiring to haue warre decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Ætolians: requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time; if they could alleadge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhion for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come or send, hee should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue bene there at the day. But when the Ætolians vnderstood this for certainie, they adiuined the Councell vnto a further time: saying, That such weightie matters ought not to be handled, sine in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open warre was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had deserved it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Inuasions made on Peloponnesus; and the onely man, in a sort, vpon whom they must haue laid the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifted it from the publike. After this, Philip went into Macedon, where he prepared bully for the warre against the yeere following. He also assayed the Illyrians, Scerdilaides, with faire words and promises: whom he easily won from the Ætolian side, forasmuch as the Ætolians had coulted him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achaens, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countrey, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedamonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce warre vnto the Ætolians; without staying (as it were) to await the euent. Hereunto they receiued diuerse

diuerſe anſweres, according to the qualities of thoſe with whom they dealt. The Acaruanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a ſmall Nation, and bordering vpon the Aetolians, of whom they ſtood in continual danger; ſaid, that they could not honeſtly reſuſe to ſhew their faithfull meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall aſſent. The Epirots that were more mightie, were neuertheleſſe more cunning and reſerued: ſo that they ſtood vpon a needleſſe point; and deſired to bee held excuſed, vntill Philip (of whoſe meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) ſhould firſt proclaim the warre. The Meſſenians, for whole cauſe the warre was vnderaken, excuſed themſelves, by reaſon of a Towne which the Aetolians held vpon their borders; and ſaid, that they durſt not be ouer-bold, vntill that bridel was taken out of their mouthes. As for the Lacedemonians; the chiefe of them ſtudied onely how to mannage that treaſon, for which their Citie had bene ſo lately pardoned: and therefore diſmiſſed the Embaſſadours of the Confederates, without any anſwere at all. They had three yeares together continued ſubiect againſt their wills to the Macedonians, expecting till when Cleomenes ſhould retorne out of Egypt to raigne ouer them againe; and maintaine, as he was wont, the honour of their Citie. In this regard they choſe not any Kings; but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of theſe there were ſome, that thought the publick ſafety to conſiſt, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preferred them: And hereto they referred all their counſailes; being perhaps not a little moued with reſpect of the benefit, which might redound vnto themſelves, by adhering firmly to thoſe which at the preſent bore rule ouer them. Others, and thoſe the greater part, were ſtill deuſing, how to make all readie for Cleomenes againſt his retorne; and therefore ſought to ioyne with the Aetolians, which were the moſt likely to giue him ſtrong aſſiſtance. The Macedonian faction had the more authoritie, and durſt more freely ſpeake their mindes: but the contrary ſide was the more paſſionate; and ſpared not by murders, or any other violent courſes, to ſet forward their deſire. Neyther did it ſuffice, that about theſe times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which theſe intended: fancying vnto themſelues the glory of their Anceſſors in ſuch Ages paſt, as were not like to come againe. Cleomenes was, they knew, the moſt able man to reſtore them vnto their greatneſſe and luſtre; which once he had in a manner performed: But ſince he was dead, and that, without iniury to his well-deſeruing vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and thoſe of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without ſuch helpe, they muſt continue little better than ſubiects vnto the Macedonian, and farre leſſe by him reſpected, than were the Achaean. Thus were they transported, by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the moſt working Spirits among them, procured the Aetolians to ſend an Embaſſie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly vnto the people; whereof no one of the Citizens durſt haue made himſelfe the Author. Much diſputation and hot there was, betwene thoſe of the Macedonian partie and theſe their oppoſites: in ſuch wiſe that nothing could be concluded; vntill by maſſacre or baniſhment of all, or the chiefe, that ſpoke againſt the Aetolians, the diuerſitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betwene the Lacedemonians and Aetolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achaean; who had ſpared the Citie, when they might haue deſtroyed it. Then alſo they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was ſo nice, and ſo regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the chooſing of the one King; that we may juſtly wonder, how they grew ſo carleſſe in making choyce of the other. In the one of their Royall Families they found Agelipolis; the ſonne of Agelipolis the ſon of King Cleombrotus; and him they admitted to raigne ouer them; as heire apparent to his Grandfather. This Agelipolis was a yong boy, ſtanding in neede of a Guardian; and had an Vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet becauſe the Law required, that the ſonne, how yong ſoeuer, ſhould haue his fathers thers whole right and title: the Lacedemonians, though ſtanding in neede of a man, were ſo punctuall in obſeruation of the Law; that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Vncle Cleomenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royall family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themſelves about any of them, to examine the goodneſſe of his Claime; but made election of one Lycurgus, who hauing no manner of title to the kingdom, beſtowed vpon each of the Ephori a Talent, and thereby made himſelfe be ſaluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus to gratifie his Partiaſans, and to approve his worth by Action; invaded the Countie of the Arginets: which lay open and vngarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great ſpoile, and wanne diuers Townes; whereof two hee retained, and annexed vnto the State of Lacedemon. After ſuch open hoſtilitie, the Lacedemonians declared themſelves on the Aetolian ſide; and proclaimed warre againſt the Achaean.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwiſe, than the Achaean and their Confederates had expected, when they firſt made preparation. Philip was not readie: the Epirots gaue vncertaine anſweres: the Meſſenians would not ſtirre: all the burden muſt lie vpon themſelves and the poore Acaruanians, whom the Aetolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could aſſaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Aetolians, paſſing ouer the Bay of Corinth, ſurpriſed the Towne of Agira: which if they could haue held, they ſhould thereby grieuouſly haue moleſted the Achaean; for that it ſtood in the mid-way betwene Argum and Sicyon two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countie. But as Agira was taken by ſurpriſe: ſo was it preſently loſt againe, through greedineſſe of ſpoile; whileſt they that ſhould haue made it their firſt care to alure the place vnto themſelves, by occupying the Cittadell and other peeces of ſtrength, fell heedleſſely to ranſack priuate houſes, and thereby gaue the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great ſlaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the ſame time, another Aetolian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Welſherne Coaſt of Achaia; waſting all the Territory of the Dymeans and other people, that were firſt beginners of the Achaean Confederacie. The Dymeans and their neighbours made head againſt theſe Inuaders, but were ſo well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They ſent for helpe vnto their Prætor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achaean hauing lately bene much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to doe little of themſelves: neither could they get any ſtrength of Mercinaries; for as much as at the end of Cleomenes his war, they had couetouſly with-held part of their due from thoſe that ſerued them therein. So through this diſabilitie of the Achaean, and inſufficiencie of their Prætor; the Dymeans, with others, were driuen to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publick ſeruiſe, and to conuert the monie to their owne defence. Lycurgus alſo with his Lacedemonians, began to winne vpon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip and the Achaean.

Philip came to the borders of the Aetolians, whileſt their Armie was thus employed a farre off in Peloponneſus. The Epirots ioynd all their forces with him: and by ſuch their willing readines, drew him to the ſiege of a Frontier peece, which they deſired to get into their owne hands; for that, by commoditie thereof, they hoped ſhortly to make themſelves Maſters of Ambracia. There he ſpent ſortie dayes, ere he could and the buſines; which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Aetolia at his firſt coming; it was thought that he might haue made an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon ſmall Townes or Forts: and not ſeldome, that the importunitie of Associates, to haue their owne deſires fulfilled, conuerts the preparations of great Kings to thoſe uſes for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindring the proſecution of their owne deſignes.

designes. Thus was our King Henrie the eight led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the siege of Townay: at such time as the French King Leues the twelfth, hearing that the Ironing Citie of Terwin was lost, and that of his Cavellerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Essex with seven hundred English: was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would haue come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambraeus, did wondrously embolden the Ætoliens: in such fort, as their Prator Scopas adventured to lead all their forces out of the Countrie; and therewith not only to ouer-runne Theffalus, but to make impression into Macedon. He ranne as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Ægean Sea: which being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, hee tooke, and razed to the ground. Hee spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the rest, he threw downe the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countreymen at his returne; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be growne terrible, not only (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euen to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrie, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip hauing dispatched his worke at Ambraeus, made a strong inuasion vpon Ætolia. Hee tooke Phœtie, Metropolis, Oeniade, Panionum, Eleus, and diuers other Townes and Castles 20 of theirs: of which hee burnt some, and fortified others. Hee also beat the Ætoliens in sundrie skirmishes, and wasted all the Countrie ouer, without receiuing any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, and to doe the like spoile in the Countrie of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Æthean Embassadors: newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were ready with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrie. These Dardanians were a barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hæmus from the Northerne part of Macedon; and were accustomed to seeke bootie in that wealthie Kingdome, when they found their owne times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a iourne into Peloponnesus: they purposed in his absence, which they 30 thought would bee long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrie; as had bene their manner vpon the like aduantages. This made the King to dismisse the Æthean Embassadors, (whom hee should haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeare. So hee tooke his way home: and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there came to him Demetrius Pharius with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Dofon, in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready, at their first request, to take part with Philip's Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whose 40 Counsailler he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie, and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Theffalie, whilst his people gathered in their Haruest. But the Ætoliens rested not. They aunged themselves vpon the Epiros: to whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre vntill another yeare was laid aside: Philip stole a iourne into Peloponnesus, with fise thousand Foot, and about foure hundred Horfe. As soone as hee was 50 within Corinth; He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word might bee carried forth of his arriuall. He sent priuily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him: with whom hee tooke order, when and in what places, hee would haue the Æthean Souldiours ready to meet him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with some-

somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horfe; little thinking to meete with such opposition. Indeed they had little cause to feare: since the Ætheans themselves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; vntill they heard, that these two thousand Eleans, Ætoliens, and their fellows, were by him surpris'd and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which hee did at his first coming, Philip got very much reputation: as likewise hee purchas'd both reputation and loue, by diuers actions immediately following. Hee wanne Phophon, an exceeding strong Towne, in the borders of Arcadia; which the Eleans and Ætoliens then held. Hee wanne it by assaull at his first coming; wherein it much 10 auailed him, that the Enemy, not beleuing that he would vndertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonable time of the yeere, was carelesse of providing euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was preferred by the King from sacke; and giuen to the Ætheans, of his owne meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lition, which yielded for very feare; hearing how easily he had taken Phophon. This Towne also he gaue to the Ætheans. The like liberality he vied towards others; that had ancient title vnto places by him recovered. Then fell he vpon the Countrie of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort among them. So he came to the 20 Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three dayes; Hee proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Ætoliens, in the spoiles of their other-wife-deferuing neighbours. Great abundance of Cattail hee tooke, with great numbers of slaves, and much wealth of all sorts; such as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes wherinto a great multitude of the Countrie-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assaull. Some yielded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his iourne, by sending Embassadors to yeeld before hee came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wills, tooke 30 courage to let themselves at libertie, by seeing the King so neare; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselves. And many places were spoiled by the Ætolian Captaines; because they distrust'd their ability to hold them. So the King wanne more Townes in the Countrie, than the sharpestasse of Winter would suffer him to stay there dayes. Faine he would haue fought with the Ætoliens: but they made such haile from him, that he could not ouertake them, vntill they had couered themselves within the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to haue bene safe. But Philip assaulted them therein so forcibly, that hee made them glad to yeeld the place; obtaining licence to depart, with their liues and armes. Hauing performed 40 so much in this Expedition, the King repoled himselfe a while in Megalopolis; and then remoued to Argos, where he spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arriuall in Peloponnesus, the Lacedæmonians with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; and threatened to doe great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings and withdrew themselves home. This Lycurgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which hee could buy with monie: so was hee neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him; nor from those iealousies, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall bloud, that thinking himselfe to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by 50 propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Commonwealth. Hee wanne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephoris as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lyc- curgus his house: wo perceiuing the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should giue account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their mindes being not hereto pradisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilst he was vying his best persuasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceiued whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So he liued afterwards among the Achaens a banished man, and hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus, he returned home; and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found means to drine out his fellow King yong Agepolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to be suspected, in such sort as once he should haue bene apprehended by the Ephori. But though 10 his actions hitherto might haue bene defended; yet rather than to aduenture himselfe into iudgement, hee chose to flie for a time, and sojourn among his friends the Aetolians. His well-known veltmencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weaknes of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, Hee tooke better heed vnto him selfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not bee in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they listed. By what actions hee got the name of a Tyrant: or at what time it was, that he chased Agepolis out of the Ci- 20 tie; I doe not certainly finde. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three vlturpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to bee placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which the last of the three very iustly deserued. Whatsoeuer he was towards some priuate Citizens: in the war against Philip, He behaued himselfe as a proud man, and carefull of his Countries good.

§. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsaillers: Who afterwards wrought treason against him, and were iustly punished. Hee inuadeth the Aetolians a second time: And forceth them to sue for peace: Which is granted vnto them.

Whilst the King lay at Argos, deuising vpon his businesse for the yeare following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently their owne greatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that hee tooke in hand. Antigonus Doson had left vnto Philip such Counsaillers, as to him did seeme the fittest men for gouerning of his youth. 40 The chiefe of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable peece of seruice to his Prince; if he could reduce the Achaens vnto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians liued. To bring this to passe; during the late Expedition hee had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achaens out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the bootie that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out, He was bold to chastise some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not reframe) to helpe their fellows; them hee laid by the heeles, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby hee thought to bring it to 50 passe by little and little, that they should be qualified with an habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vnusht that pleased the King. But these Achaens were tenderly sensible in matter of libertie: whereoff if they could haue been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them them in the warre against Cleomenes: They bemoaned themselves vnto old Aratus; and besought him to thinke vpon some good order; that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus soorthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weightie, than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words vpon those that had bene wronged; and forbad Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he stumbled his choller for a time. He thought to well of his owne Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee 10 than that among the Achaens there were some, who bore no heartie affection to Aratus. These he enquired out: and sending for them, entertained them with wordes of Court; promising to become their especiall friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, He must be faine to deale precisely with the Achaens; and, as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achaens, and all other Peloponnesians, bee 20 quickly brought to conformance themselves vnto the dutie of obedient Subjects. By such persuasions, He drew the King to be present at Aegium, where the Achaens were to hold election of a new Praetor. There with much more labour, than would haue bene needfull in a businesse of more importance; the King, by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new Favorites, was chosen Praetor, instead of one more worthis, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very strong Cattle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The Garrison yielded it vp for feare, at his first comming: whereoff hee was glad, for that hee had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymeans, as hee presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrie the last Winter, hee had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his Prisoner; because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vnderooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Aetolians, and joyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to do, He willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand, That he would render vnto them freely all prisoners which hee had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forein inuasion; and that they should hold their libertie entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute; or being kept vnder by any Garrison. These Conditions were not to be 40 dispised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Cattle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrie: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before ouer-haite to beleue such faire promises) so suspect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was set on worke for no other ends, than to breed a mutuall diffidence betweene them and the Aetolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him Prisoner into Aetolia. But hee perceiued their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for him selfe; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was said) maruailing what should be the cause, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made vnto them 50 by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsailler, thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good; And long of them hee said it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out; For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Arats (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside and giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be very præjudiciall to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian; And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a false lie; deuic'd by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard his tale, but in a great rage hee sent for the two Arats; and bad Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already conuicted. And when hee had said all the rest, ere either Philip or they spake any word; Hee added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath round you such vngratefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achaens; and therein hauing made it knowne what yee are, to depart into Macedon, and leaue you to your felues. Olde Aratus grauely admonish'd the King; That whensoever hee heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth; He should forbear a while to giue credit, vntill hee had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and hee should neuer thereof repent him. At the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talke with Amphidamus; and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the King should make himselfe Authour of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King lik'd well; and said that he would make sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilst Apelles delaied to bring in the prooffe, which indeed hee wanted; Amphidamus came from Elia, and told what had befallne him there. The King was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Arats: which when hee found no better than a meere deuice against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The vnrestfull temper of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; began (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venomous for want of his free motion. Hee betakes himselfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his doings with those of the vulgar, hee had prepared a snare for the Arats; so sayling of them, hee thinks it wisdome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chimney; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtle workmanship of a Cob-web. Of the four that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus; and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithful men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the Targetiers, and Megaleus chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily wonne to bee at Apelles his disposition. This Politician therefore studied how to remooue the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their rooms. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinarie way, by calumnyation and priue detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion hee vsed more finenesse; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, and one, whom for his many vertues, the King might ill spare from being alwayes in his presence. By such Art he thought to haue remoued him, as wee say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sunne. In the meane season Aratus retired himselfe; and sought to auoid the dangerous friendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; He was a man of no dispatch, and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the monie and the Corne, wherewith he should haue bene furnished by the Achaens. This made the King

vnderstand his owne error; which he wisely sought to reforme betimes. He perswaded the Achaens to rejourne their Parliament from Aegium, to Siegon the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his sonne: perswading them to forget what was past; & laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, Hee easily obtained what hee would of the Achaens. Fifty talents they gaue him out of hand; with great store of Corne; and further decreed, That so long as hee himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, he should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to prouide shipping, that so hee might invade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; euen by the ministry of those whom hee most hated. Wherefore hee entered into conspiracie with Leontius and Megaleus: binding himselfe and them by oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of abilitie to doe any thing without them, should make him speake them laire; and beglad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a childe; and therefore the wise men perswaded themselves, that, by looking bigge vpon him, and imputing vnto him all that fell out ill through their owne misgouernment of his affaires, they might rule him as a child still. Apelles would needs goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the prouisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two (aid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked oath, than of their dutie.

His fleet and Armie being in a readines: Philip made countenance, as if he would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therefore the Ætolians sent men, little fearing that the mischief would haue fallen as soone after it did, vpon themselves. But against the Eleans and those that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leaue the Achaens, with some part of his and their Mercenaries. He himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Isle of Cephalonia: whence the Ætolians, dwelling ouer against it, vsed to furnish themselves of shipping, when they went to roue abroad. There hee besieged the Towne of Palæa, that had been very seruiceable to the Enemy against him and his Confederates; and might bee very vfe-full to him, if hee could get it. Whilst hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fiftene ships of warre from Sceerhalidas; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Towne was obstinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts saue one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith hee ouerthrew two hundred foote thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targetiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But hee, remembering his covenant with Apelles; did both wilfully forbear to doe his best; and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many slaine; not of the worst souldiers, but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would haue carried the Towne, if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindered the victory. The King was angry with this; but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was easier vnto the Towne-men to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst he stood thus perplexed, and vncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Countrey. The Messenians alleaged, that Lyceurgus was busie in waisting their Countrey: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Erelian windes which then blew, seruing fitly for his Nauigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easily carrie him thither, so would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-dayes) and make him spend the

Summer

Summer to small purpose. But Aratus gave better counsaile, and prevailed. Hee shewed how vnfitting it were, to let the Aetolians ouer-run all Thessalie againe, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small adventures. Rather, he said, that the time now scrued well to carry the warre into Aetolia; since the Prætor was gone thence abroad on rousing, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycurgus; hee was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus; and it might suffice, if the Acheans were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King lets saile for Aetolia; and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which diuided the Aetolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and ioyned with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. Hee marched vp into the in-land Countrie: and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retreat; Hee passed on to Thermum; which was the Receptracle of the Aetolians, and furest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Fastnesse, enuironed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, deepe, and difficult ascent. There did the Aetolians vse to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their sollemne games. There also they vsed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest securitie. This opinion of the naturall strenght, had made them careless in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there was nothing else to doe than to take spoile: whereof hee found such plentie, that hee thought the paines of his iourne well recompensed. So hee loaded his Armie; and consuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chiefe of all belonging vnto the Aetolians; in remembrance of the like their courtesie, shewed vpon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue bene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monseur du Gourgues the French Capitaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Aetolians laid for him: which that they would doe, hee beleueed before; and therefore was not taken vnawares. Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts; but hee had laide a Counter-ambush for them of his Illyrians; who laying behind the rest, did set vpon the backs of the Aetolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with slaughter of the enemy, he returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that he had taken before, as also wasting the Country round about him, Hee safely carried all that hee had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Aetolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauerie. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The ioy of this victorious Expedition being euery way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any finisier accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megalæus. They came, because they could not choose: but their heauie looks argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperitie. It grieved them to thinke, that they should bee able to giue no better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had plaied his owne part with a most mischeuous dexteritie. The sorrow and indignation, which they could ill dissemble in their faces, brake out after supper, when they had warmed themselves with drinke, into open riot. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reuiling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him lend for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megalæus, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder;

order; and they, to giue him froward answers: inso much as they said at length, That they would neuer giue ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as hee deserued. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megalæus, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, It was euo I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angrie; seeing himselfe out-frowne, and not knowing how to remedie the matter. Shortly after, Megalæus was called forth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victorie at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no lesse touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megalæus that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weak; that he, and Crimon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twentie Talents: Crimon being remanded backe to prison; and Leontius becoming Bayle for Megalæus. This was done vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as he was at Corinth, he tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedæmonians. These and the Eleans had done what harme they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Acheans had opposed them as well as they could; with ill success; yet so, as they hindered them from doing such harme as else they would haue done. But when Philip came, hee ouer-ran the Countrie about Lacedæmon; and was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleuee that he was returned out of Aetolia. Hee tooke not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fields: and hauing beaten the enemy in some skirmishes, carried backe with him to Corinth a rich bootie of Cattell, slaues, and other Countrie-spoile. At Corinth hee found attending him, Embassadors from the *Rhodian*s & Chians; that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Aetolians. They had gracious audience: and hee willed them to deale first with the Aetolians; who, if they would make the same request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Aetolians had sped ill that yeere: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeeres following. The Armie that they had sent forth to wait Thessalie and Macedon, found such opposition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had bene grievously afflicted, as before was shewed, by Philip in the center of their owne Countrie. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should bee able to hold out; since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each, to seeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Aetolians readily entertained this Negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirtie dayes with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to entreat his presence at a Diet of their Nation, that should bee held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that hee should finde them conformable to any good reason.

Whilst these things were in hand, Leontius and Megalæus thought to haue terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Armie. But this device for to no good effect. The souldiours were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends; who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the bootie, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noise, and breaking open of dores; without further harme done. This was enough to informe the king (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the souldiours themselves, repenting of their insolence, desired to haue the Authors of the tumult fought sought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if he had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleus were sore afraid, lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Archetect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repaire to Corinth, where hee might stand betweene them and the kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the businesse, vnderaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was hee growne into such credit, that all the Kings officers in Macedon and Thessalie addressed themselves vnto him; and received from him their dispatch in euery businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles; making slight mention (onely for fashon sake) of the king: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogance of this great man, in setting himselfe out vnto the people: but in manning the kings affaires, he made it his speciall care, that monie, and all things needfull for the publike seruice, should be wanting. Yea he enforced the king, for very neede, to sell his owne Plate and houlhold vessels: thinking to resolute these and all other difficulties, by onely saying, Sir, he ruled wholly by mee, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the king would giue assent; then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his iourne from Chalcis in the Isle of Euboea, to the Citie of Corinth where Philip then lay: hee was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captaines and souldiours; which Leontius and Megaleus drew forth to meete him on the way. So entering the Citie with a goodly traine; he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings Chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride; and had vehement suspicion of his fallshood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should waite a while, or come another time; for the king was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretie thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsaake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him save his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of prinacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megaleus to looke vnto himselfe, and runne away betimes. Hereupon the King sent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to doe some peece of seruice, but indeed of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they forthwith sent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were objected against him, hee might not be called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megaleus, if that were all the matter, they said that they were readie to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiours, made Philip more hastic than else he would haue beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleus were intercepted, which he wrote vnto the Ætolians; vilifying the king with opprobrious wordes; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was euen readie to sinke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the king vnderstood more perfectly the fallshood, not onely of Megaleus, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore hee sent one to pursue Megaleus, that was fled to Thes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their liues. Megaleus also, neither daring to stand to triall, nor knowing whither to flic, was wearie of his owne life; and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their o-

ouerthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Neuertheless being a turbulent Nation, and readie to lay hold vpon all advantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleus, together with some indignation thereupon conceived by the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and therevpon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing forie. For being in good hope thoroughly to tame this vnquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the warre should rest vpon themselves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates, to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following; where in hee hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian souldiours, by yielding to let them winter in their owne Countrie. In his returne homeward, he called into iudgement one Ptolemie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthe to die, that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip was some bordering Townes; from which the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome: when hee had thus provided for safetie of his owne; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embassadors from the Rhodiens and Cibins, with others from Ptolemie King of Ægypt, and from the Citie of Byzantium, recontinuing the former solicitation about the Peace. This fashion had beene taken vp in matters of Greece, euer since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to set the whole Countrie at libertie: No sooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppressed, and subdued by force of war, but presently there were found intercessours, who pitying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of neede, the Princes and States abroad sought to binde vnto them those people, that were howsoever weak in numbers, yet very good souldiours. But hereby it came to passe, that the more forward sort, especially the Ætolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to fallshood and roberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well assured, that if they had the worst, The loue of Greece would be sufficient to redeme their quiet. They had, since the late Treatie of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Achaens, and standing in feare to bee more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer to the Embassadors, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue no occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present either afraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Ætolians, if they had a desire to liue in rest, must first be dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answer as he should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the midst of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the battaille at Thrymene. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian warre. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelans an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing war betweene themselves, felues, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans, or the Carthaginians, had subdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith looke Eastward, and seeke by all means to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrey should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of war, should lay hold on the opportunity; now fitly serving, to enlarge his dominion, by winning somewhat in Italie. Such aduice could the Aetolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatening them at hand: but being soone after wearie of rest, as accustomed to enrich themselves by pillage, they were so farre from observing and following their owne good counsell, that they invited the Romans into Greece, wherby they brought 10 themselves and the whole Countrey, (but themselves before any other part of the Countrey) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That every one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

PHILIP, at the perswasion of DEMETRIUS PHARIUS, enters into League with HANNIBAL, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betwene HANNIBAL and PHILIP.

His being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselves to quiet courses of life; and Philip, to prepare for the businesse of Italie, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Canna: after which hee ioyned in League with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before: Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to bee auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, 30 that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwife beene farre more expedient for Philip, to haue supported the weaker of these two great Cities against the more mightie. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equall termes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsaile which he followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Aetolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon Conditions that might easily be broken: haue beene related in another place as belonging vnto the second Punicke 40 warre. Wherefore I will onely here set downe the tenour of the League betwene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthie to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed; though it had beene ouer-long to haue beene inserted into a more busie peece.

THE OATH AND COVENANTS BETWEENE HANNIBAL, GENERALL OF THE

Embassador of PHILIP King of Macedon.

HIS is the League ratified by oath, which HANNIBAL the Generall, and with him MAGO, MYRCAL, and BARMOCAL, as also the Senatours of Carthage that are present, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Armie, haue made with XENOPHANES the sonne of CLEOMACHVS Athenian, 20 whom King PHILIP the sonne of DEMETRIUS hath sent vnto vs, for himselfe and the Macedonians, and his Associates: Before Jupiter, and Iuno, and Apollo: before † The god of the Carthaginians, Hercules, and Iolau, before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sun, the Moone, and the Earth; before 30 Riuers, and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods that haue power ouer Carthage; before all the Gods, that rule ouer Macedon, and the rest of Greece; before all the Gods, that are Presidents of War, and present at the making of this League. HANNIBAL the Generall hath said, and all the Senatours that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Armie: Be it agreed betwene You and Vs, that this Oath 40 stand for friendship and louing affection, that Wee become friends, familiar, and brethren, vpon Couenant, that the safety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of HANNIBAL the Generall and those that are with him, and of the Rulers of Prouinces of the Carthaginians vsing the same Lawes, and of the Vticans, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the 50 Carthaginians, and of the Souldiors and Associates, and of all Townes and Nations with which We hold friendship in Italie, Gaulle, and Liguria, and with whom We shall hold friendship ship or make Alliance hereafter in this Region; be preserved by King PHILIP and the Macedonians, and such of the Greekes as are their Associates. In like manner shall King PHILIP and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Associates, bee saved and preserved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Uticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obze the Carthaginians, and by their Associates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italie, Gaule and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or shall hereafter ioyne with Vs in Italie. VVee shall not take counsaile one against the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. Withall readinesse and good will, without deceit or subtiltie, We shall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting those Kings, Townes, and Hauens, with which We haue already league and friendship. Wee also shall be enemies to the enemies of King PHILIP, excepting those Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which VVee haue already league and friendship. The war that VVee haue with the Romans, haue Ye also with them, untill the Gods shall giue vs a new and happie end. Ye shall aide Vs with those things whereof VVee haue neede, and shall doe according to the Couenants betweene Vs. But if the Gods shall not giue vnto You and Vs their helpe in this warre against the Romans and their Associates; then if the Romans offer friendship, VVee shall make friendship in such wise that Ye shall be partakers of the same friendship, With Condition, That they shall not haue power to make war vpon you: Neither shall the Romans bee Lords ouer the Corcyraens, nor ouer those of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They shall also render vnto DEMETRIUS PHARIUS all those that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after such peace made) shall make war vpon Ye or Vs; We will succour one another in that warre, as either shall haue neede. The same shall be obserued in warre made by any other, excepting those Kings, Kings, Cities, and States, with whom Wee hold already league and friendship. To this League if VVe or Ye shall thinke fit to adde or detract, such addition or detractiō shall be made by our common consent.

b. IIII.

How PHILIP yielded to his naturall vices being therein soothed by DEMETRIUS PHARIUS. His desire to tyrannize vpon the free States his Associates: With the troubles, into which hee thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punicke warre. He poisoneth ARATUS: and growes hateful to the Achaeans.

HERETO Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisdom, he might haue offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punicke warre, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrey. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath bene said) by DEMETRIUS PHARIUS: who, looking thoroughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly gouerned him, euen as he listed. For the vertues of PHILIP were not indeede such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudie, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what hee listed, and not otherwise listeing to doe what hee ought, than so farr forth, as by making a faire shew he might breede in men such a good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before he should busie himselfe in Italie, hee thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Hereunto APOLLES had aduised him before: and hee had liked reasonably well of the course. But APOLLES was a boisterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deeply wronged if he might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunitie at better times. DEMETRIUS PHARIUS could well be contented to obserue the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reins in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore hee grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, hee supplanted ARATUS: which the violence of APOLLES could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betwene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forrein warre) vnto domestick objects: than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In procelle of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that PHILIP was entreated to compound the differences. Hee was glad of this: resolving so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth stirre any more about their Government: for that he would assume it wholly to himselfe. At this coming thither, hee found ARATUS busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in priuate with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the unruly Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular pular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being to many, would suffer themselves to be oppress'd by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselves from Tyrants. Thus whilest each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere he were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouvernours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Oratours, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the People tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemed, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogges their guardians were slaine. But his fallshood and double dealing was immediatly found out. Neyther did the younger Aratus forbear, to tell him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angrie at this. But hauing alreadye done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should neede the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as he could. Hee led old Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There he pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice hee did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse; for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadell of Corinth, which hee had alreadye, commaunded the entrance into that Countrey. Whilest hee was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrails of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner; He shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, hee should quicly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a litle; were it onely for desire to make amends, for the angrie words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou bee a Sowlyayer, thou maist goe thy wayes, and let slippe this good advantage; If thou be a King, thou must not neglect the opportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus he spake, resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two hornes of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip neede heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, Hee must lose all the other Castles that hee held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his soldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as hee had done hitherto, by their owne good wils, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yielded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing betwene Him and the Arats; whom he thought more forward than befecemed them, in contradicting his will. Neyther was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as he plainly discouered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceived, that in resorting to his house, He had bene dishonest with his sonnes wife. Hee therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despite of Cleomenes, his owne Countreiman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, where in Aratus refused to beare him companie. In this iourne He found by experience what Aratus had lately told him; That vnbonest counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and so they purposed to continue. But He would needes haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxious vnto his will, Hee seized vpon their Towne of Oricum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what hee listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to helpe them. Thus in stead of settling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italie required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench; vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whilest he was thus labouring to bind the hands that should haue fought for him in Italie: M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts; who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Ætolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre; the occurrents whereof wee haue related before, in place whereto it belonged. In manning whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure serued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. He had not quire left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another iourne into their Countrey, with hope to deceiue them, as before. They vnderstood him better now than before; and therefore were not halitie to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, Hee went to worke by force; and calling them his Enemies, invaded them with open warre. But in that warre hee could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messene the lost Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counsailler, and Flatterer, not his peruerter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that he spied, the more angrie he waxed against those, that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the Ministerie of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poysoned old Aratus; and shortly after that, hee poysoned also the younger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue bene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselves were more sure, than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Acchia, decreed vnto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to be celebrated every yeer twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose; as was accustomed vnto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to haue bene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to haue bene true; since the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increafe of Idolatry.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Acheans a maruelous dislike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counsaile for themselves. At the present, the murder was not generally knowne or beleueed: neither were they in case to sublift, without his helpe that had committed it. The Ætolians were a most outrageous people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans had made a League: whereof the Conditions were soone divulged, especially that maine point, concerning the diuision of the purchase which they should make; namely, That the Ætolians should haue the country and townes; but the Romans the spoile, and carrie away the people to sell for slaves. The Acheans, who in times of greater quiet could not endure to make streight alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their vnciuill disposition; were much the more auerfe from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greekes account all other Nations except their owne) to make haucke of the Country. The same consideration moued also the Lacedemonians, to stand off awhile, before they would declare themselves for the Ætolians; whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industrie therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Acheans his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially at such time, as their owne necessitye was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himselfe the Dymnians, by an inestimable benefit: recovering their Towne, after it had bene taken by the Romans and Ætolians; and redeeming their people wherefoeuer they might bee found, that had bene carried away

Capitue,

Captiue, and sold abroad for slaues. Thus might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences past; if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not other whiles broken out, and giuen men to vnderstand; that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof he was not ashamed; He tooke Polyratia the wife of the yonger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serue to confirme in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time: for that which happened in this their first Inuasion, I holde it superfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of PHILOPOEMEN Generall of the Acheans: and MACHANIDAS, Tyrant of Lacedemon. A battaile betwene them, wherein MACHANIDAS is slaine.

IT happens often, that the decesse of one eminent man discouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood vp Philopamen: whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Acheans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and carelesse of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopamen: who being then a yong man, and hauing no command; did especiall seruice to Antigonus at the battaile of Sellasia against Cleomenes. Thenceforward vntill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldome neuer at peace betwene themselves; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horle: wherein he carried him selfe so strictly, trauiailing with all the Cities of the Confederacie to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also he so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of seruice, that hee made the Acheans very strong in that part of their forces. Being after chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, Hee had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrey might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Acheans to cut off their vaine expence of brauerie, in apparrell, householdstuffe, and curious farr, and to bestow that cost vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiours; and futeable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had serued hitherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast as farre off: that were vfefull in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprizes, or sudden and hallic Expeditions; whereto Aratus had become most accustomed. But when they came to handie strokes, they were good for nothing: so as they were wholly driuen to relie vpon the courage of their Mercinaries. Philopamen altered this: causing them to arme themselves more weightily, to vse a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for seruice at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order; and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files so deepe as had beene accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the seruice of many hands.

Eight Moneths were spent of that yeere, in which hee first was Prætor of the Acheans; when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedemon caused him to make trial, how his Souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the successfull ynto Lycurgus; a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a strong Armie of Mercinaries: and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta; but to hold the

the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behoued him not to take part with the Acheans, that were fauourers of libertie; but to strengthen himselfe by friendship of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their owne profit. The people also of Lacedemon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argives, Acheans, and Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very vnwisely. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindred themselves thereby from recouering the Maitrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his owne securitie, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but made him alwayes ready to fall vpon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whilest they were enforced, by greater necessitie, to turne face another way. Thus had hee often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden coming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had vsually made him faile of his attempts. At the present He was stronger in men, than were the Acheans; and thought his owne men better Souldiours than were theirs.

Whilest Philip therefore was busied elle-where, hee entred the Countrey of the Mantineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea
10 and perhaps to get the * Lordship of Peloponnesus, as hauing stronger friends, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopamen was readie to entertaine him at Mantineæ; where was fought betwene them a great battaile. The Tyrant had brought into the field vpon Cartes a great many of Engines; wherewith to beate vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To preuent this danger, Philopamen sent forth his lightarmature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one and the other side came in continuall supplie; till at length all the Mercinaries, both of the Acheans and of Machanidas, were drawne vp to the fight: being so far aduanced, each before their owne Phelans, that it could no 30 other wise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Enginies made vnersueivable, by the interposition of his owne men; in such manner as the Canon is hindered from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercinaries of the Tyrant preuailed at length: not onely by their aduantage of number, but (as Polybius well obserueth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of courage; wherein vssually the hired souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant, than they which liue oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, haue hope to acquire somewhat beneficiall to themselves, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) 40 to assure their owne fruitude: so the Mercinaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruites of his prosperitie, haue good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their owne; whereas they that serue vnder a free State, haue no other motiue to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the Victorie: many Companies (if not all) of Forreine Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore such good fellows will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victorie of a Tyrant, makes him stand in neede of more such helpers: because that after it he doth wrong to more, as hauing more subjects; and therefore stands in feare of more, that should seeke to take reuenge vpon him. The stipendaries therefore of the Acheans, being forced to giue ground, 50 were vrged so violently in their retrait by those of Machanidas, that shortly they be-tooke themselves to fight, and could not bee slaid by any perswasions of Philopamen, but ranne away quite beyond the battaile of the Acheans. This disaster had bene sufficient to take from Philopamen the honour of the day; had hee not wisely obserued the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that error which might restore restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gaue chace vnto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedemonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Acheans, that were already disheartened by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of fight, Philopamen advanced towards the Lacedemonians that stood before him. There lay betwene them athwart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedemonians adventured ouer it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Acheans; who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaille; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Acheans, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopamen getting ouer the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopamen knew better how to vse his aduantage, than Atachanides had done. Hee suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chace: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chace, looked very heauily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet with a lustie Troupe of Horse about him Hee made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Acheans in disorder; and to set vpon their backs, as they were carelessly pursuing their Victorie. But when he and his Companie saw Philopamen ready to make good the bridge against them; then beganne euerie one to looke, which way he might shift for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was easily discouered by his purple Caslocke, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopamen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge vnto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as he was getting ouer it, slew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battaille on the Lacedemonians side about foure thousand; and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achaean Mercenaries, probable it is that the losse was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their monie they might hire more when they should haue need.

B. VI.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia; and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victorie the Acheans learned to thinke well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after awhile (such was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of war inferior to any, that should haue brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Adaceonian, He made no great vse of them: But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, He studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or very neerely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Acheans would haue done him seruice; they must, by helping him to oppress others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with himselfe. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joynd with the Romans and Ætolians in warre against him.

This

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble man, other wise than as he was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Philetæus his Vncle: who being guiled, by reason of a mislay which hee had when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to bee the more enured; as great men in those times repofed much confidence in Eunuches, whose afflictions could not be obliged vnto wives or children. He was entertained into the familie of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that tooke him selfe to Lyfimachus King of Thrace. Lyfimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in truit with his monie and accomps. But when at length hee stood in feare of this King, that grew a blonde Tyrant: Hee fled into Asia, where he seized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lyfimachus. The towne and monie, together with his owne seruice, He offered vnto Seleucus the first, that then was ready to giue Lyfimachus battel. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleucus hauing slaine Lyfimachus, died shortly after himselfe, before he made vse of Philetæus or his monie. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Countie about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. Hee had two brethren: of which the elder is said to haue been a poore Carter; and the younger perhaps was not much better; before such time as they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetæus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his aduantage of the dissention, betwene Seleucus Calinius and Antiochus Hierax, the sonnes of the second Antiochus. He fought a battaile with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes, and won the victorie. At which time, to animate his men against the Gauls that serued vnder his Enemy, he vied a pretie deuice. He wrote the word * VICTORIAE vpon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off: and when the hote liuer of the beast that was sacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainly fore-shewing that the gods would bee assisstant in that Battaille.

* Vul. Front. Strat. L. i. c. 11.

After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Seleucus: who neuer durst attempt to recover from him, by warre, the Territories that hee had gotten and held. Finally, when hee had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a surer of ouermuch drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalus, of whom wee now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the yongest brother of Philetæus. Attalus was an vnderstanding Prince, very bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He restored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence hee had been expelled. He was grievously molested by Acheans: who setting vp himselfe as King against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was belieged in his owne Citie of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Tedofagæ, a Nation of the Gauls, whom hee called ouer out of Thrace, He recovered all that hee had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they neuer wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interpoled themselves, without invitation, and found themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his warre against Byzantium. Whereunto when hee had condescended; they neuerthelesse within a while after inuaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vied it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing; they occupied the Region about Hellepont: where, in feating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuerthelesse, presuming afterwards vpon their strength; they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time following.

restore the victorie. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries gaue chace vnto those that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battaile his Lacedemonians; whom hee thought sufficient to deale with the Achaens, that were alreadie dishearted by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashnesse had carried him out of sight, Philopamen aduanced towards the Lacedemonians that stood before him. There lay betwene them athwart the Country a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficultie, especially for Foot. The Lacedemonians aduanced ouer it, as thinking themselves better souldiers than the Achaens, who had in a manner alreadie lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their owne Battaile; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further banke, than they were stoutly charged by the Achaens, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopamen getting ouer the ditch, easily chased them out of the Field. Philopamen knew better how to vse his aduantage, than Machanidas had done. Hee suffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chace: but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come backe. The Tyrant with his Mercinaries returning from the chace, looked very heauily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet with a lustie Troupe of Horse about him hee made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Achaens in disorder; and to set vpon their backs, as they were carelessly pursuing their Victorie. But when he and his Companie saw Philopamen ready to make good the bridge against them; then beganne euerie one to looke, which way he might shift for himselfe. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his companie, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage ouer. He was easily discovered by his purple Caske, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopamen therefore leauing the charge of the bridge vnto another, coasted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it selfe, as he was getting ouer it, slew him there with his owne hand. There died in this Battaile on the Lacedemonians side about foure thousand; and more than foure thousand were taken Prisoners. Of the Achaen Mercinaries, probable it is that the losse was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their monie they might hire more when they should haue need.

§. VI.

PHILIP hauing peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia; and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victorie the Achaens learned to thinke well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after awhile (such was their discipline, and continuall exercise) to account themselves in matter of war inferior to any, that should haue brought against them no great oddes of number. As for the Macedonian, He made no great vse of them: But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, He studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He tooke in hand many matters together, or very neerely together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achaens would haue done him seruice, they must, by helping him to oppress others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with himselfe. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Ætolians in warre against him.

This

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Noble man, other wise than as he was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Philetarus his Vncle: who being guided, by reason of a milbap which hee had when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to bee the more esteemed: as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuches, whose affections could not be obliged vnto wives or children. He was entertained into the familie of Decimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betooke himselfe to Lyfimachus King of Thrace. Lyfimachus had good opinion of him; and put him in truit with his monie and accompts. But when at length hee stood in feare of this King, that grew a blouidie Tyrant: Hee fled into Asia, where hee seized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lyfimachus. The town and monie, together with his owne seruice, He offered vnto Selencus the first, that then was readie to giue Lyfimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Selencus hauing slaine Lyfimachus, died shortly after himselfe, before he made vse of Philetarus or his monie. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus with the Countrie about it; and reigned therein twentie yeeres as an absolute King. Hee had two brethren: of which the elder is said to haue been a poore Carter; and the younger perhaps was not much better; before such time as they were raised by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetarus left his Kingdome to the elder of these, or to the sonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his aduantage of the dissention, betwene Selencus Calinius and Antiochus Hierax, the sonnes of the second Antiochus. He fought a battaile with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes, and won the victorie. At what time, to animate his men against the Gauls that serued vnder his Enemy, he vsed a pretie deuice. He wrote the word * VICTORIE vpon the hand of his Soothsayer, in such colours as would easily come off; and when the hostliuer of the beast that was sacrificed, had cleaenly taken the print of the letters, He published this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainly fore-shewing that the gods would bee assistant in that battaile.

After this victorie, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Selencus: who neuer durst attempt to recover from him, by warre, the Territorie that hee had gotten and held. Finally, when hee had reigned two and twentie yeeres, hee died by a surfeit of ouermuch drinke; and left his Kingdome to Attalus, of whom wee now entreat, that was sonne vnto Attalus the yongest brother of Philetarus. Attalus was an vnder-taking Prince, very bountifull, and no lesse valiant. By his owne proper forces He restored his friend Antiochus the Cappadocian into his Kingdome, whence hee had been expelled. He was grieuouly molested by Achaens: who setting vpon himselfe as King against Antiochus the great, reigned in the lesser Asia. He was besieged in his owne Citie of Pergamus: but by helpe of the Tediosages, a Nation of the Gauls, whom hee called ouer out of Thrace, He recovered all that hee had lost. When these Gauls had once gotten footing in Asia, they neuer wanted employment: but were either entertained by some of the Princes reigning in those quarters; or interposed themselves, without invitation, and found themselves worke in quarrels of their owne making. They caused Prusias King of Bithynia to cease from his warre against Byzantium. Whereunto when hee had condescended; they neuerthelesse within awhile after invaded his Kingdome, Hee obtained against them a great victorie; and vsed it with great crueltie, sparing neither age nor sexe. But the swarme of them increasing; they occupied the Region about Hellepont: where, in seating themselves, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuerthelesse, presuming afterwards vpon their strength, they forced their neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute. In the sharpe exaction whereof, they had no more respect vnto Attalus than to any that had worse deserved of them. By this they compelled him to fight against them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themselves within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time following.

ing, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they still to oppresse the weakest of their neighbours; and to fill vp the Armies of those, that could best hire them.

The Kings reigning in those parts, were the posteritie of such, as had saved themselves and their Provinces, in the storthful reigne of the Persians; or in the busie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were verie ancient. For the first of their line had married with Atossa, sister vnto the great King Cyrus. Their Countrey was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is shewed before. But the son of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, elpying his time while the Macedonians were at ciuill warres among themselves; recovered his dominion, and passed it ouer to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; and are said to haue issued from the royall house of Achamenes. The Paphlagonians deriued themselves from Pylamenes, a King that assisted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselves vnto the times, were alwayes conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bithynia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, hauing other employment, they were the lesse molested. Calanus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Countrey; where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigenus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, vntill the reigne of Prusias, whom wee haue alreadie some 20 times mentioned.

2. VII.

The Towne of Cius taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, Philip grows hateful to many of the Greekes: and is warred vpon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

PRUSIAS as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatnesse he suspected. He therefore strengthened himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrarie side, entred into a strict Confederacie with the Aetolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Aetolian warre, and was deuising with Antiochus about sharing betwene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolemie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his sonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong child his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, thereto winne the Towne of the Ciani, and be-flow it vpon him. Prusias had no right vnto the Towne, nor iust matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly feared for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came; as one that could not well denie to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby hee mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilst hee lay at the siege, from the Rhodians, and diuers other States: entreating him to forsake the Enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answeres: making shew as if he would condescend to their request; when he intended nothing lesse. At length hee got the Towne: where, even in presence of the Embassadors, of whose sollicitation he had seemed so regardfull, hee omitted no part of crueltie. Hereby hee rendered himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his Fact was detested of the Rhodians: who had made vehement intercession for the poore Ciani; and were aduertised by Embassadors of purpose sent vnto them from Philip. That, how foule it were in his power to winne the Towne as soone as he listed: yet in regard of his loue to the Rhodians, hee was contented to give it ouer. And by this his clemencie the Embassadors said, that he would manifest vnto the World, what slanderous tongues they were; which noyed abroad such reports, as went of his fallhood and oppressions. Whillett the Embassadors were declaiming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect, there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked and destroyed the Towne of Cius; and, after a cruell slaughter of the Inhabitants, had made slaues of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despight, no lesse were the Aetolians inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawne from their Confederacie to his owne) what little truit was to be reposed in the faith of this King. But most of all others was Attalus moued, with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his owne estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a strong Partie in Greece. He had alreadie, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchasing with much liberaltie the loue of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertues, hauing lost their owne. On the friendship of the Aetolians he had caule to presume; hauing bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were mightie at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Aegyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, hee easily drew into a straight Alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceived against Philip.

Vpon confidence in these his friends, but most of all in the readie assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had been vnreasonable to procrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemie tended; since his desire to fasten vpon Asia was manifest, and his fallhood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Cnius, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driuen to runne his owne ship on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians tooke his death wound: and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie, by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the Wracks vpon the shore: Yet forasmuch as He had suffered farre greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemie: and since He durst not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victorie was adjudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards besieged and wanne some Townes in Caria: whether onely in a brauerie, and to despight his opposites; or whether vpon any hopefull desire of conquest; it is vncertaine. The stratageme, by which hee wonne Prinassus, is worthe of noting. He attempted it by a Myne: and finding the Earth too stonie, that it resisted his worke, He neuertheless commanded the Pyoners to make a noyse vnder ground; and secretly in the night-time hee rayled great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the worke went maruclously forward. At length he sent word to the Townesmen, that by his vnder-myning, two acres of their wall stood onely vpon wooden props: to which if he gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercie. The Prinassians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise vp those heapes which they saw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they suffered themselves to be outfaced, and gaue vp the Towne as lost, which the Enemie had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not stay to settle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haste backe into Macedon: whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

2. VIII.

p. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seeke matter of quarrell against PHILIP. The Athenians, upon slight cause, proclaime warre against PHILIP, moued there- to by ATTALVS; whom they flatter. PHILIP winnes diuers Townes: and makes peremptorie answer to the Roman Embassa- dour. The furious resolution of the Abydens.

THese Asiaticke matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet ser-ued well to make a noyse in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making warre in Macedonia, at least with a conceit that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Easterne Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greekes, which lay betwene them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greekes were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece euer since the Reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betwene him and the Naturals: yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because He was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had been most beholding vnto him, were neuertheless wearie of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: especially since the diuisions of the Country were such, that euerie petty Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generalitie. But the poore Commonaltie of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were already quite exhausted, by that greivous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loane to the Repub-like all their monie: neither had they as yet receiued, neither did they receive vntill fifteene or sixteene yeeres after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of paiment also which was already made, being not in present monie, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to rest awhile; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they took no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadors to sollicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M.
Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous e-nemie, that solicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadors, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong either of himselfe, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Athenians their good friends, and in a manner his owne professed enemies. But such things must be published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermeddling in the affaires of those, that were more mightie than himselfe. He was too vnskilfull, or otherwise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needes be seeking new enemies. And he found them such, as he deserved to haue them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in miserie, and had done him no harme. It behoued him therefore, either to haue strained his forces to the utmost in making warre vpon them; or, in desisting from that injurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But He, hauing broken that League of peace which is of all other the most naturall,

naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnlesse they think themselves iustly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly perswaded, that he might wel be secure of the Romans, because of the written Couenants of peace betwene him and them.
There is not any forme of oath, whereby such articles of peace can be held inuolable, save onely by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilst it binds one partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparent that he shall bee a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) bee presumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans neuer hear-ned after Philip: for necessitie made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was this Riuer of Styx dried vp: and then could they swear as Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne selues, euen by their good swords, that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sopater into Affricke, and the present warre against Attalus; were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their owne barren Ter-ritorie,ooke state vpon them neuertheless, as in their ancient fortunc. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of Idolatrous superstition, vainly saide to bee auailable vnto felicitie after this life) discovered themselues by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Here-vpon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by mere error, not thinking to haue therein done amiss;
yet, as it had beene for some hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrymen at home tooke this in ill part; and sought to reuenge it as a publicke iniurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procurer therefore of Philip some Macedonians, to helpe them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword; and carried thence away with them a great bootie. This indignitie stirred vp the high-minded Athenians; and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had abilitie to performe.
All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadors to King Attalus; gratulating his happie successe against Philip, and entreating him to visit their Citie.
Attalus was hereto the more willing; because he vnderstood, that the Roman Em-bassadors, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to bee there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his owne followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, hee found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued enemy to Philip; and He being no lesse glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the warre. The Athenians came forth of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wiues and children, in as solemne a pompe as they could deuise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in very louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of obseruation, which their flatterie could suggest. At his first coming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe; saying, That with an euill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which he studied to make them know what loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he should deliuer in writing, what he would haue to be propounded. He did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed betwene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation vnto them, to declare themselves against the Macedonian, whilst he with the Rho-dians, and the Romans, were willing and readie to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, He protested, that afterwards it would bee vaine to craue his helpe.
There needed little entreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as

Hee to desire it. As for other matters; they loaded him with immoderate honours: and ordained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the bodie of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if Hee were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodiens they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodiens free Citizens of Athenes.

Thus beganne a great noyse of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodiens taking all vpon them. But while these were vainly mis-spending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætolians to their partie; that contrarie to their olde manner were glad to bee at quiet: Philip wanne the Townes of Maronea and Erym, with many other strong places about the Hellepont. Likewise passing ouer the Hellepont, Hee layd siege vnto Abydus; and wanne it, though Hee was faine to stay there long. The Towne held out, rather vpon an oblitinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodiens, then any great ability to defend it selfe against so mightie an Enemy. But the Rhodiens sent thither only one Quadrireme Gallie; and Attalus no more than three hundred men; farre too weak an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadours wondered much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much vpon them.

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Æmilius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptoleme Epiphane King of Ægypt, to acquaint him with their victorie against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thanke him for his fauour vnto them shewed in that warre; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should neede it against Philip. This Ægyptian King was now in the third or fourth yeere of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philepator had done before him) Hee beganne a very young boy. The courtesie for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, That out of Ægypt they had lately bene supplied with Corne, in a time of extreme dearth; when the miseries of Warre had made all their owne Prouinces vnable to releue them. This message could not but bee welcome to the Ægyptian; since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselves against him; conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason bee hoped, that Hee, or his Councell for him, should offer to supplie the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leisure, and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmilius the youngest of them should steppe aside, and visit Philip, to trie if he could make him leaue the siege of Abydus, which else Hee was like to carry. Æmilius, comming to Philip, telles him, that his doings are contrarie to the League that Hee had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodiens, vpon whom Hee made warre, were Confederate with Rome; and the Towne of Abydus, which Hee was now besieging, had a kind of dependencie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodiens had made warre vpon him: and that Hee did only requite them with the like. Doe you also (sayd Æmilius) requite these poore Abydenns with such terrible warre, for any the like Inuasion by them first made vpon you? The King was angry to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore Hee roundly made answer to Æmilius, It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (above all,) your being a Roman, that makes you thus presumptuous. But I would wish yee to remember the League that yee haue made with mee, and to keepe it: If yee doe otherwise, I will make yee understand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So Hee dismissed the Embassadour; and had the Towne immediately yielded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died euery one of them, and set their Towne on fire; binding themselves hereto by

by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reasonable Conditions. But hauing in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meete by the Gouernours and Ancients of the Citie to change this resolution; and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Siluer to Philip: about which whilest they were busie, the memorie of their oath wrought so effectually in the younger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselves. Hercof the King had but little compassion, that Hee said, he would grant the Abydenns three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the Towne; or hazard themselves in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

The Romans decree warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederats.
How poore the Athenians were at this time,
both in qualitie and estate.

His calamitie of the Abydenns, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interessed in the quarrell. But to helpe themselves with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athenes: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that he should presently imbarke himselfe for Italie, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in five moneths, but in the short space of five dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpicius the Consul tolde the Multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to vndertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Serpio into Africke; to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Country. By such arguments was the Commonaltie of Rome induced to beleue, that this warre with the Macedonian was both iust and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediately the same Consul halted away towards Macedon, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before, and all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must bee acquainted with. Great thanks were giuen to the Athenian Embassadours, of their constancie (as was sayd) in not changing their faith at such time as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselves, that any Greece Towne, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts; had reason to giue thanks vnto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an vttruse suggestion, That Philip was making ready for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodiens, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to giue them protection: these busi-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadours into all parts of the World, euen to Ptoleme of Ægypt, and to the Romans; as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authours of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheless as it looes to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpicius the Consul were such, as might haue argued Athenes to bee the least part of his care. Hee failed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the readie way to Macedon; and landing about the Riuer of Aspis, betwene Dyrachium and Apollonia, there beganne the warre. Soone vpon his comming the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craued his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilest he was so farre from them. They bemoaned themselves as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer them. For which cause He sent vnto them C. Claudius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces Hee retained with him, for the prosecution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeede besieged: onely some Rowers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Eubæa, and some bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vied to take their shippes and spoile their fields, because they had declared themselves against King Philip, that was Lord of these two Townes. The Robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warlike Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arrivall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preferred them. As for the Athenians themselves; they that had been wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the Conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicil, to make warre vpon the great Persian King; and to hold so much of Greece in subiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three shippes, and those open ones, not much better then long Boates. Yet thought they not themselves a whit the worse men; but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their owne.

PHILIP, returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred forth to giue him entertainment; or perhaps before hee had well resolved, whether it were best while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: Hee receiued aduertisement from Chalcis of a grievous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such works at Athens as they had expected, or as was answerable to the fame that went abroad; purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the Warre, and make his owne employment better. Hee grew soone weary of sitting as a Scarre-Crowe, to see the Athenians grounds from spoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The Towne of Chalcis was negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiours therein, for that there was no enemy at hand; and more negligently by the Townsmen, who reposed themselves vpon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius hauing aduertisement, sailed thither by night for feare of being discryed; and, arriuing there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. He vied no mercie, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it, (vnlesse hee should haue left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) Hee set it on fire; consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all provisions for Warre, which were plenteously filled. Neither were Hee and his Associates contented contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their shippes, and with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned: but to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrow and brake in pieces the Statues vnto him there erected. This done, they halted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit were like to be ioyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet hee made all haste to take reuenge. Hee thought to haue taken the Athenians, with their trustie Friends, busie at worke in ransaking the Towne, and loading themselves with spoyle; but they were gone before his comming. Five thousand light-armed-foote hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leauing at Chalcis onely a few to burie the dead, Hee marched thence away speedily toward Athens: thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-Post that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not discryed him afarre off; and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Post came thither: who found all the Towne asleepe, as fearelesse of any danger. But the Magistrates, hearing his report, caused a Trumpet out of their Citadell to sound the Alarme; and with all speed made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who seeing the many lights, and other signes of busie preparation vsuall in such a case, vnderstood that they had newes of his comming; and therefore willed his men, to repose themselves till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compasse about by Sea, and had no cause of halte) yet hauing in the Towne some mercinarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, besides the great multitude of Citizens; they aduentured to issue forth at a gate, whereto they saw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all those his owne, that were thus hardie. He therefore onely willed his men to follow his example; and presently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight he gaue singular prooffe of his valour: and bearing downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great slaughter backe into the Citie. The heat of his courage transported him further, than discretion would haue allowed, euen to the very gate. But he retired without harme taken; for that they which were vpon the Towres ouer the gate, could not vse their casting weapons against him, without indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the Citie. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exercise, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments besides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which he spared none; but suffered the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the sepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and some Companies of Attalus his men from Egina; too late in regard of what was already past: but in good time, to preuent him of satisfying his anger to the full, which as yet hee had not done. So he departed thence to Corinth: and hearing that the Achaens held a Parliament at Argos, He came thither to them vnexpected.

The Achaens were deuising vpon warre: which they intended to make against Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being started vp in the roome of Machanidas, did greater mischief then any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly vpon his Mercenaries; and of his subjects had no regard. He was a cruell oppressor; a greedy extortioner vpon those that liued vnder him; and one that in his naturall condition smelt rankly of the Hangman. In these qualities, his wife Apegea was very fitly matched with him, since his dexteritie was no greater in spoiling the men, than hers in fleecing their wiuers; whom he would neuer suffer to be at quiet, till they had presented her with all their iewels and apparell. Her husband was so delighted with her propertie, that hee caused an Image to be made liuely representing her;

and apparrelled it with such costly garments as shee vsed to weare. But it was indeede an Engine, serving to torment men. Hereof he made vse, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him some rich man, of whose monie hee was desirous; Hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfaite Apega stood, and there vse all his Art of perswasion, to get what hee desired, as it were by good will. If he could not so speede, but was answered with excuses; then tooke he the refractorie denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his wife Apega (who sat by in a Chaire) could perswade more effectually. So heeled him to the Image, that rose vp and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Those armes were full of sharpe yron nayles, the like whereof were also sticking in the 10 breasts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith she griped the poore wretch, to the pleasure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worse (for it were long to tell all here that is spoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouvernement. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Ætolians, as Machanidas and Lycorgus had done before him. By these he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former Warre. Of Philip's vertue hee stood in feare; and therefore durst not prouoke the Achaens, as long as they had such an able Commander. But when Cyclades, a farre worse Captaine, was their Prætor; and all, or the greatest part of their Mercenaries were discharged; Philip being also gone into Crete, to follow his 20 beloued Occupation of Warre: then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and wasting all the fields, made them distrust their owne safetie in the Townes.

Against this Tyrant the Achaens were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had set downe, what proportion of Souldiours euery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselves with the care of this businesse; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thanks they accepted of this kinde offer. But then hee told them, That, whilst he made warre vpon Lacedæmon, Hee ought not to leaue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, and some 30 Companies into the Ile of Eubœa; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediately they found out his device; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans: Wherefore their Prætor Cyclades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis; hee brake vp the Assemblie, with euery mans good liking; whereas in former times, Hee had been thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieved the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Achaens. Nevertheless, he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philodes one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had been doing what harme he might vnto the Countrey. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Haven of Pyraus, and euen the Citie of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselves into euery of these places; that hee could no more then break his anger vpon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So Hee destroyed all the workes of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne, or, hauing long agoe been masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choice was found. Neither did hee onely pull all downe: but caused his men to 50 breake the very stones, that they might be vniuicible to the reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon; and there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardaniens, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infest him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætolians: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Nanpausus, he sent an Embassage; requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped vpon the Riuer of Asopus. Thence he sent forth Apustius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Armie to waste the borders of Macedon. Apustius tooke sundrie Castles and Townes; vsing such extremities of sword and fire at Antipatris, the first good Towne which he wanne by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vntill they knew themselves able to holde out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoile, He was charged in Retre, vpon the 10 passage of a Brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captaine: but the Romans had the better; and killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their bootie, with which they arrived in safetie at their Campe. The success of this Expedition, though it were not great; yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the sonne of Sceudilaidas the Thyrian; Aminander King of the Atthamians; and Bato, the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardaniens. They offered their assistance vnto the Consul, who thanked them: and said, That hee would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon; but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Countreylay betwene the Ætolians and 20 Thessalies, might bee perhaps auailable with the Ætolians, to stirre them vp against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set vpon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadours from the Macedonians, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first: and saide, That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betwene his Master and the Ætolians: so was it to be hoped, that they would not suffer themselves without good cause, to be carried away after other mens fauies. Hee prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended onely to defence of the Ætolians: and yet notwithstanding had bene angry, that the Ætolians, by making 30 peace with Philip, had no longer neede of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection vpon those that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greekes. For euen after the same sort had they lent their helpe to the Alamertines: and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian Tyrants: but now both Syracuse and Messana, were subiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect hee alledged many examples, adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Ætolians: who, if they drew such Masters into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, and 40 send them such a Moderator, as went euery yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, That it was best for them, whilst as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly bee reconciled: and with whom they had three yeeres agoe made the peace which still continued; although the same Romans were then against it, who sought to breake it now.

It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were set on by them to speake next: who had 50 store of eloquence, and matter of reprimand enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne King had, in few dayes past, made war vpon the gods themselves, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pitifull rehearsal of their owne

owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might haue his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athens it selfe, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue felt, if the wals and the Roman armes had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken armes, went roundly to the point in hand. They sayd, that they had of late made warre in the Ætolians behalfe, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselves, by alleging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to giue them aid conuenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their warre and victorie, vnlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceiued, that they which were so vehement, in offering their helpe ere it was desired, were themselves carried vnto the war by more earnest motives, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue bene the cause, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor shifed them off awhile with a dilatorie answer: though hee told his Countrymen, That by reseruing themselves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That over-much haste was an enemy to good counsell: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming neerer to the matter in hand, He passed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude upon this business; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was unlawfull to treat of such affaires, except in two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

PHILIP was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their solicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby disappointed, in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to dis-appoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardaniens; hauing with him some of the Kings Councill, to gouerne both him and his armie. It was iudged, as may seeme, that the presence of the Kings sonne, how young soeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies; by making them at least beleue, that he was not weakely attended. And this may haue been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whom earnest businessse called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heraclides, would serue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harme by sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his iourne Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the country of the Dassaretij, a people in the vtmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candania; that running along from Hemus in the North vntill they ioyne in the South with Pindus, inclose the Westerne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of his horse, to entertaime them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driuen backe into their Campe. Now although it was so, that the King was vnwilling to hazard all at first vpon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his owne forces: yet being no lesse vnwilling to lose too much in reputation; He made shew a day after, as if he would haue fought. He had found the aduantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and

10 to loage charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captaines, to prouoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themselves respectively, as opportunitie should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush; hauing fought vpon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had bene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him so hotly, that they draue him to an halting flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not staying to let them runne into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the 20 King had some desire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which hee therefore presented the second time; leading forth his Armie, and setting it in order, with Elephants in front: in kind of helpe which the Romans had neuer vied before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce about foure score yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italie, to affright the Romans, who had neuer scene any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilest possibly some were yet alive, which had knowen that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greekes haue none. Philip had patience to let the Consul braue him at his Trenches: wherein hee did wisely: for the Roman had

30 greater neede to fight, than Hec. Sulpicius was vnwilling to lose time: neither could hee without great danger, lying so neere the Enemy, that was strong in horse, send his men to fetch in corne out of the fields. Wherefore he removed eight miles off; presuming that Philip would not adventure to meete him on euery ground; and so the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrie. The King was nothing sorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: euen till their presumption, and his owne supposed feare, should make them careless. When this was come to passe, hee tooke all his horse, and light-armed-foote, with which hee occupied a place in the midway, betwene the Forragers and their Campe. There he stayed in Couert with part of his forces: to keepe the passages

40 that none should escape. The rest hee sent abroad the Countrie, to fall vpon the straglers: willing them to put all to the sword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The slaughter was great: and those which escaped the hands of them that were sent abroad to scowre the fields, lighted all or most of them vpon the King and his companies in their flight: so as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there escaped some: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had happened to themselves, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends forth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse diuided themselves, accordingly as they met with aduertisements vpon the way, into 50 many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philip's Troupes, that were canuassing the field, tooke their taske where they found it. But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disaduantage: as coming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was readie for them.

So

So they were beaten away: as their fellows also might haue borne, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an hauest, he was too greedie about a poore gleanings: the Roman Legions appeared in fight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne safety. They ranne which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are seldome heedfull of that which may befall themselves) to escape the Enemy, they declined the fairest way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had bee beene cast away, if a louing subject of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his horse; and deliuered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foote was ouertaken, and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with impudent rashnesse; and the Consul, with as much dulnesse, for his dayes seruice. A little longer stay would haue deliuered the King from these enemies without any blowe: since when all the fields about them were waiked, they must needs haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side it was not thought vnlikely, that if the Romans following the King, had set vpon his Campe, at such time as he fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might haue vwonne it. But that noble Historian, Liuie, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much to blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Armie lay safe in his Campe; and could not bee so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe; He was aduertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardaniens, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perseus was called away from custodie of the Straights. This was it which made him aduenture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might let the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose he sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, hee marched away by night; and left fires in his Campe to beguile the Enemy, as if hee had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when hee heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He ouertooke the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a wooddie ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vse; being a square battaile of pikes, not fit for euerie ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruiceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrowes were of small force against the Roman shield. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open vnto the Consul some poore Townes thereabout: which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yielded for feare. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Armie; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardaniens, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselves apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenagoras to vvaite vpon them home; whilst he himselfe went against the Ætoliens. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætoliens, who had rescued himselfe and his Nation vnto the cunct of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and againe: as also that Pleuratus and the Dardaniens were fallen vpon Macedon; grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before hee had beene vsife. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaim warre, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Albanian; and made inuasion vpon Thessalie. They tooke and cruelly sacked a few Townes: whereby they grew grew confident; as if without any danger, they might doe what they listed. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay dispersed, was like to haue taken their Campe; if Aminander, more warie than the Ætoliens, had not helped at need, and made the Retreat through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the same time; the Roman Fleet, assisted by Attilus and the Rhodiens, had taken some small Islands in the Ægean Sea. They tooke likewise the Towne of Oreum in the Ile of Eubœa; and some other places thereof. The Townes were giuen to Attilus, after the same Compact that had formerly beene made with the Ætoliens: the goods therein found were giuen to the Romans; and the people, for slaues. Other attempts on that side were hindred; either by foule weather at Seas; or by want of daring, and of means.

§. XII.

VILLIUS the Roman Consul wastes a yeere to no effect. Warre of the Gauls in Italie. An Embasie of the Romans to Carthage, MASANISSA, and VERMINA. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom: and T. QUINTIUS FLAMINIUS is sent against him.

Has the time ranne away; and P. Villius, a new Consul, tooke charge of the warre in Macedon. Hee was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldest Souldiers: whereof two thousand, hauing serued long in Sicily and Africa, thought themselves much wronged, in that they could not bee suffered to looke vnto their owne estates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had serued at Canna: as may seeme by their complaint, of hauing beene long absent from Italie; whither faime they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were shipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the Historie of his yeere is lost: whereof the misse is not great; since hee did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we find in Liuie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit against Philip. Yet since Liuie himselfe, an Historian to whom few of the best are matchable, could finde no such thing recorded in any good Authour; we may reasonably beleue, that Villius his yeere was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian Warre, the Romans found more trouble than could haue bin expected with the Gauls. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and strong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Asdrubal, had beene able to force, was taken by these Barbarians, and burnt in a maner to the ground. In like sort Oranona was attempted; but failed her selfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie: Amilcar a Carthaginian, that staid behind Asdrubal, or Mago, in those parts; was now become Captaine of the Gauls, in these their enterprises. This when the Romans heard, they sent Embassadors to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderstand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behoued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made warre in Italie. Hereunto it was added (perhaps lest the message might seeme otherwise to haue fauoured a little of some feare) That of the Fugitive slaues belonging vnto the Romans, there were some reported to walke vp and down in Carthage: which if it were so, then ought they to bee restored backe to their Masters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embassadors that were sent on this errand; had further charge to treat with Masanissa, as also with Vermina the sonne of Sipha. Vnto Masanissa, besides matter of complement, they were to signifie what pleasure Hee might doe them, by lending them some of his Numidian Horse, to serue in their Warre against against the Macedonian. Vermine had entreated the Senate, to vouchsafe vnto him the name of King: and promised thereafter to deserue it, by his readinesse in doing them all good offices. But they were somewhat scrupulous in the matter: and said, That hauing beene, and being still (as they tooke it) their Enemie, He ought first of all to desire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vied not to conferre vpon any, saue onely vpon such as had royally deserued it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto these Embassadors vpon such termes as they should thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: bani-10 shing him; and confiscating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corne to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masaniissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with half: the number; and would accept no more. Vermine met with the Embassadors, to giue them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdome; and, without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his 20 Gauls: they laid siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the Victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwarde should haue the managing of warre among those Gauls. So was there good leasure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to giue contentment vnto his subjects, by punishing a bad Counsellour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Acheans, by rendering vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of E-
30 pirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to find way into Macedon, taking a iourne (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose coming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. QUINTIVS winnes a passage 40 against PHILIP. The false waies by PHILIP, the Romans, and Asolians. The Acheans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. PHILIP deliuer Argos to NA-
BIS the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If hee refused it, they besieged his 50 Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when hee had long forborne it (as it would bee interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weaknesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they beganne to learne of the fable Greekes, the arte of Negotiation: wherein wherein hitherto they were not growne so line, as within a little while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and flood indebted, * many yeeres after this, vnto pri-uate men, for part of those monies that had been borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonalty auerfe from the Macedonian Warre; and had thereby driuen the Senators greedy of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet beeing weary of the slow pace wherewith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse neede to relie vpon their Confederats. So they leaued eight thousand foot, and eight hundred 10 Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselves to the moit of their abilitie, they should (besides other difficulties, incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred some ieaoulie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost

20 some friends, yea, perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiours. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite, for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadors; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it 30 vncourteously, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarkable. They said, That it was not their manner to vse the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also be well contented to afford it; That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadors, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an amonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carrie themselves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus: who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus.
30 But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius halting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the supplie decreed vnto him; which consisted, for the moit part, of olde Souldiours, that had serued in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his comming hee presently discharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the River of Aspus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compass about, and seeke their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage, which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had al-
40 ready two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of Victuals: whereof they could neither carrie with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountaines, which diuided the South of Epirus from Thessalie: then should they enter into a plentiful Countrey; and which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuerthelesse, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the River of Aspus, running along through that Valley which alone was open betweene the Mountaines, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocke by mans hand.
50 Wherefore Quintius assailed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemie, who neglected not the gard of them that was very easie; Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of fortie dayes.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the Warre might be ended by

2. XIII.

The Romans beginne to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a passage

whererin

whererin hitherto they were not growne to fine, as within a little while they proued.
Their Treasury was poore, and flood indebted, many yeeres after this, vnto priquisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadours; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who invaded it; or else that they would not take it 20 vncourteously, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke

That it was not their manner to vse the aid of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also be well contented to asoord it; That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale doe their best to perswade an atonement betweene them. In such louing fashion reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Armie from the Kingdome of Attalus.

30 But how little they regarded these tearmes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip; it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius hauing away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seeke their way

der. Neuerthelesse, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likely-hood. For the Ruer of Apfus, running along through that Valley which alone

a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine Rocke by mans hand.
50 Wherfore Quintius assailed to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his Enemie, who neglected not the gard of them that was very easie; Hee was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of fortie dayes.

composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that Hee and the Consul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consul would haue him to set all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the injuries, which hee had done to many people in his late Warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late: but vnto such, as had been long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, He thought it against all reason, that he should relinquish his claime and dominion ouer them. Hee also said, That as farre fourth as it should appeare that he had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoever, He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme conuenient in the iudgement of some free State, that had not been interessed in those quarrels. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (hee sayd) no iudgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies bene the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this alteration, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Townes, that he would haue to be set at libertie; the first that hee named were the Thessalians. These had been Subiects (though conditionally) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer since the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians, the King in a rage demanded, what sharper Condition Hee would haue layd vpon him, 20 had he been but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly hee flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Consul stroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to haue preuailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolute what course to take: there came to him an Herdsman, sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who having long kept beasts in those Mountaines, was thoroughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore vnderooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should haue aduantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound: and, being promised great reward, in case he 30 made good his word; had such Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They trauielled by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and rested in the day-time, for feare of being discovered. When they had recouered the hill-toppes, and were about the Macedonians, (though vndiscovered by them, because at their backs) they raised a great smoke; whereby they gaue notice of their successe vnto the Consul. Some skirmishes, whilst these were on their iourney, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonians; thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning hee saw the smoke arise more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were sent: He pressed as neere as he could vnto the Enemies Campe; 40 and assailed them in their strength. Hee prevailed as little as in former times; vntill the shoutings of those that ranne downe the Hill, and charged Philip on the backe, astonished the Macedonians, that they betooke themselves to flight. The King, vpon first apprehension of the danger, made all speed away to saue himselfe Yet anon considering, that the difficulty of the passage must needs hinder the Romans from pursuing him: He made a stand at the end of five miles; and gathered theretogether his broken troups, of whom hee found wanting no more than two thousand men. The greatest losse was of his Campe and prouisions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians beganne to stand in feare, lest being driven from a place of such aduantage, they should hardly make good their part against 50 the Enemy, vpon equall ground. Neither was Philip himselfe much better perswaded. Wherefore hee caused the Thessalians, as many of them as in his battie retreat hee could visit, to forsake their Townes and Countrey; carrying away with them as much as they were able, and spoyling all the rest. But all of them could not be perswaded, thus to abandon (for the pleasure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the substance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly resisted him; which they might the better doe, for that hee could not stay to vie any great compulsion. He also himselfe tooke it very grieuouly, that he was driven to make such waste of a most pleasant and fruitfull Countrey, which had euer been well affected vnto him: so that a little hindrance did serue, to make him breake off his purpose; and withdraw himselfe home into his Kingdome of Macedon.

The Aetolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were euen in a readinesse to invade Thessalie; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their severall Countreies. When therefore they heard for certaintie, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they foreflowed not the occasion; but made all speede, each of them to lay hold vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten so much before his coming, that He, in cleaning after their haruest, could not finde enough to maintaine his Armie. Thus were the poore Thessalians, of whose libertie the Romans a few daies since had made shew to bee very desirous, wasted by the same Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themselves, or whom to auoide. T. Quintius wan Phaleria by assault: Metropolis and Piera yielded vnto him. Rhage he besieged: and hauing made a faire breach, yet was vnable to force it; so stoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and 25 by a Macedonian Garrison therein. Philip also at the same time, hauing somewhat recollecte his spirits, hovered about Tempe with his Armie; thrusting men into all places, that were like to be distressed. So the Consul, hauing wel-neere spent his vituals, and seeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his siege, and departed out of Thessalie. Hee had appointed his shippes of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Haven towne of Phocis, on the Gulfe of Corinth: which Countrey being friend to the Macedonian, he presently invaded; not so much for hatred vnto the people, as because it lay conueniently seated betweene Thessalie and other Regions, wherein he had businesse; or was shortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocis he wan by assault: many were yielded vp vnto him for feare; and within short space he had (in 30 effect) mastered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Consuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, ioyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They wan two Cities in Euboea; and afterward layd siege vnto Cenebre, an Haven and Arceval of the Corinthians on their Easterne Sea. This enterprise did somewhat help forward the Achans, in their desire to leaue the part of Philip: since it might come to passe, that Corinth it selfe, ere long time were spent; and that Cenebre, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred vnto their Nation, by fauour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Achans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had bene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilst being intangled in a dangerous warre, he wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they might hold the safest. His tyrannous practices to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poysoning of Aratus their old Governour: His falsedealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long since to hold him as a necessary euill, euen whilst they were vnable to bee without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopamen, they were growne somewhat 50 confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to friend: then did they only thinke how euill he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angred him to perceiue how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers, to take away the life of Philopamen. But failing in this enterprise, and being detected, he did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was throughly drie before, and prepared to burne. Philopamen wrought so with the Achaens, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian. Cycliades, a principall man among them, and lately their Prator, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristanus chosen Prator, who laboured to ioine them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Achaens; making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achaens was held at Sicyon, to deliberate and resolve in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Achaens, to ioine with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadours of Philip, whom he had also sent for this buisnes, admonishing the Achaens of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philip's Embassadour, did no way advance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Achaens to vnderstand, That hee, who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocal demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell; who remembering the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the fence of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; prevailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which hee (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much alteration the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this war. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into societie: with the Romans (because no League would be of force, vntill the Senate and People had approued it) they forbore to decree any societie at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadours from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argines, hauing done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound, rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with honestie thereto giue assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argines had so little thanks; that all the rest of the Achaens may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a solemne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discovered it selfe so plainly, in the behaue of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Philodes, a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither comming on a sudden, and finding the Multitude ready to ioine with him, hee easily compelled the Achaen Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and some other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gaue him hope to obtaine some good end by Treatie, whilst as yet with his honour he might seek it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Consul would shortly bee chosen; who should take the worke out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the sooner. Titus had the like respect vnto himselfe; and therefore thought it best, since more could not be done, to praedipose things vnto a Conclusion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-shore, in the Bay then then called the Adrian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is supposed) the Gulfe of Ziton, in the Aegan Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Ammander the Albanian; an Embassadour of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes; and some Agents for the Attolians and Achaens. Philip had with him some few of his owne Captaines, and Cycliades, lately banished for his sake out of Achaia. He refused to come on shore: though fearing (as he said) none but the immortal Gods: yet midoubting some treachery in the Attolians. The demands of Titus in behaue of the Romans were, That he should sett all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all prisoners which he had of theirs, and Renegado's; likewise whatsoeuer hee held of theirs in Illyria; and whatsoeuer about Greece or Asia he had gotten from Ptolemie then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded restitution to be made entire, of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and ioyley in the late warre betwene them. The Rhodians would haue againe the Countrie of Persea, lying ouer against their Iland; as also that he should withdraw his Garrisons, out of diuers Townes about the Hellepont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achaens desired restitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not vniuilly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their consent. The Attolians tooke vp on them angrily, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leaving it free; and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, whatsoeuer hee held that had at any time beene theirs. Neither were they here-withall content: but insolently declaimed against him, for that which he had lately done in Thessalie, corrupting (as they said) the rewards of the Victors, by delroying, when he was vanquished, those Townes which else they might haue gotten. To answer these malapert Attolians, Philip commanded his Gallies to row neerer the shore. But they began to plic him atreth: telling him, that he must obey his betters; vnlesse he were able to defend himselfe by force of Armes. He answered them, (as he was much giuent to gybing;) with sundry scoffes; and especially with one, which made the Roman Consul vnderstand, what manner of companions these Attolians were. For hee said, That he had often dealt with them; as likewise the best of the Greekes; desiring them to abrogate a vicked Law, vvhich permitted them to take spoile from spoile: yet could he get no better an answer, than that they would sooner take Attolia out of Attolia. Titus wondered what might bee the meaning of this strange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable custome, as often as warre happened betwene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by sending voluntaries to serue on both sides, that should spoyle both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece, He said it was strange that the Attolians should be so carefull thereof, since diuers Tribes of their owne, which he there named, were indeede no Greecians: wherefore hee would faine know, whether the Romans would giue him leaue to make slaues of those Attolians, which were no Greekes. Titus hercat smiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Attolians well rattled vp; touching whom he began to vnderstand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that generall demand of setting all Greece at libertie, Philip acknowledged, that it might well become the greatness of the Romans; though hee would also consider, vvhich might become his owne dignitie. But that the Attolians, Rhodians, and other pettie Estates, should thus presume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might he should be herunto compelled: it vvas, he said, a strange and ridiculous insolence. The Achaens he charged vith much ingratitude; reciting against them some Decrees of their owne; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, vvhich more then humane honors. Neuerthelesse he said, that he would render Argos vnto them: but, as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate vith Titus himselfe. Thus he addressed himselfe vvholly to the Roman Generall; vnto vvhom if he could giue satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late vvarre, he said vvas onely defensiu; they hauing been the offenders: or if he gaue them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did hee see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than hee at theirs. For whereas they complained, that, spoyleing a Temple of Venus, hee had cut downe the Groue, and pleasant walkes thereabouts: what could hee doe more, than send Gardiners thither with yong plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus heistled the matter out: but offered neuerthelesse, in honour of the Romans, to giue backe the Region of Peraa to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being so ill provided of Counsaile, said Titus, you may euen thanke your selfe, as hauing murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the waightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolve. But it was beleued, that he thereby sought to abridge the Aetolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that hee desired conference in priuate with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That hee would giue the Achaens both Argos and Corinth, as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Aetolians, that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoever they did challenge. This when Titus his affiaits heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the King were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which hee now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could nor perswade them, hee would suffer himselfe to be perswaded by them. So the third day they mette early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with sincere affection harken vnto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendered; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadours to Rome, where hee would referre himselfe to the courtesie of the Senate.

This was euen as Quintius would haue it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the warre. So hee easily preuailed with the rest, to assent herunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vsuit for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resolutely either in Warre or peace. Further, he willed them to send their severall Embassadours to Rome: which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their preiudice. Among the rest hee perswaded King Amir, to make a iourney to Rome in person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadours, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his owne Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons vvhich they alleaged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadours of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; vvhich was more delirious of victorie, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vndertaking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could neuer be effected, vnlesse especiall care were taken, that the King should bee dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Countrey, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruilite; litie; that the Senate agreed to haue it euen so as they desired. When therefore the Embassadours of Philip were brought in, and began to haue made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the middelt of their Preface, with this one demand: whether their Master would yeeld vp Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: Heereto they made answere, That, concerning those places, the King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer harken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadours haue truly saide, That neither the Aetolians, Achaens, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treatie required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any Claime to either of these Townes? As for Corinth, whereto the Achaens had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargain vnto an Other) Philip had alreadye confederated to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue bene alleadged, euen against the Greeks in excuse of the King, by some of Quintius his friends; that so hee might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, it a Successor had bene decreed vnto him. But since hee was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor hee himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadours into Greece, cared to giue care vnto any talke of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Achaens had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common enemies; thought euen to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedaemonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had bene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians and Achaens together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted in a manner wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant; though stiling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achaens: and therefore seemed vnto Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be won. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be assigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tie him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philoetes the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Lacedaemonians, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sonnes. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnlesse by decree of the citizens themselves He might be called into it. Hereabout Philoetes dealt with the Arguines: but found them so averse; that, in open assemblie of the people, they detested the verie name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to rob and fleece them. So hee willed Philoetes, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which hee was ready to receiue. Philoetes accordingly did let him with his Armie into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Arguines: who for very loue had forsaken the Achaens, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that stayed behinde, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Siluer. Also a great imposition of money was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more adoe. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or played the theenes, in purloynning their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, besides losse of their wealth, had their tortments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating gating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath bene an olde custome of Tyrants, to assure themselves of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, Hee sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to joyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse over the Streights into Peloponnesus, thereto meet with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauil touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans fixe hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete; as also hee agreed with the Acheans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the finall conclusion of peace betwene them vntill the Warre 10 of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIII.

The battaile at Cynosephala, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

TITUS QUINTIUS, as soone as he vnderstood that he was appointed to haue Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent pursuit of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre; meant afterwarde wholly to relie vpon himselfe.

Plus in uita T. Quintii.

Titus had in his Armie about fixe and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemy intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessalie; and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to haue met vnawares, neere vnto the Citie of Phera: where the vant-courriers on both sides discovered each other; and sent word thereof vnto their severall Capitaines. But neither of them were over-hastie, to commit all to hazard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred Horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their severall Campes, with little aduantage vnto either side. The Countrie about Phera was thicke set with Trees: and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles; which made it vnproper for seruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue back vnto Sistuf in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully serued with all necessities. Titus conceiued aright his meaning: and therefore purposed also to march thitherwards; were it only to waste the Countrie. There lay betwene them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neuerthelesse they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous; and forced each of them to take vp his lodging, where he found it, by chance. Then sent they forth discouersers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply; that if the resistance of the Aetolians had not bene desperate, the Romans; their fellows had bene driuen backe into their Campe. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians prevailed: so that Titus himselfe was 50 faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to animate those which were in fight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his estate as might thereon depend. But the newes came came to him thicke and tumultuously, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own; if he could vse an occasion, the like whereof he should not often find. This caused him to alter his purpose: in so much as he embattailed his men; and climbed vp those hills, which, for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynosephala. As soone as hee was on the hill-top; it did him good to see that they of his owne light armature were busie in fight, almost at the verie Campe of the Enemies; whom they had repelled so farre. He had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serue best his aduantage: forasmuch as the Romans were quite driuen from all parts of the Hill. But of this 10 commoditie he could make no great vse: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, seruing nothing apply for his Phalanx. Neuerthelesse hee found conuenient roome, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie: and gaue order vnto his Capitaines, to follow with the rest, embattailing them as they might. Whilest hee was doing this: Hee perceived that his Horsemen and light armature beganne to shrink; as being false vpon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driuen to recoyle. He lets forward to helpe them: and they no lesse hastily draw vnto him for succour; hauing the Romans not farre behinde them.

As the Legions beganne to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx 10 to charge their pikes, and entertaine them. Heere Titus found an extreme difficult piece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now vsed in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner vsed, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together vndissolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points aduanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvell, if the Romans gaue backe: euery one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come neerer vnto the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot or thereabout. Titus 30 finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee obserued, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much vneuenesse of the ground, to put themselves in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or else (which was worse) vpon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to bee partakers in the worke, ranne foolishly along by the side of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder Hee made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaille to march vp the hill, against the selfe ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to 40 dispute what should bee done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as hauing no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeede if they should haue done their best, it could not haue serued; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons vnusefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip hauing fixe and twentie thousand in his Armie (as he is said to haue bene equall to the Enemy in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine foureteen thousand Pikes; whereof hee himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in a Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx hauing 50 usually fixteene in File, must, when it consisted of seuen thousand, haue well neere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would serue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might bee cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to euery man of them three foot of ground: this Front must haue occupied twelue hundred Foote, or two hundred and forty paces; 248

that is, very neere a quarter of a mile in length. Such a space of open Champaine, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that must of necessity disioyne this close battaile of the Phalanx; was not euer where to be found. Here at Cynosephale Philip had so much roome, as would onely suffice for the one halfe of his men: theret were faine to stand still and looke about them; being hindred from putting themselves in order, by the roughnesse of the Daggas heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from coming vp vnto them; nor found any difficultie in masting those enemies, whose feet were in a manner bound by the discommoditie of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to giue backe; and the coming on 10 of the Legions, to betake themselves vnto flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, seeing the victorie on that part assured, left the prosecution of it vnto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainly helpfull to making of the Victorie complete. Hee considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on so farre; as that himselfe with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten about the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand: and making downe the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hind- 20 most ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeed saue the first five, were accustomed, when the battailes came to joyning, to carrie their Pikes vp right; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their foremen: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconuenience in the Macedonian Phalanx, that it serued neither for offence nor defence, except onely in Front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Mejopotania, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the foure sides of it were as so many Fronts looking sundry wayes, because hee expected that he should be encompassed round: yet it is to bee vnderstood, that herein he altered the vsuall forme; as also at the same time he embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Like wise it is to be considered, that Alex- 30 anders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keep their owne ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemie, vnlesse their hindmost ranks could haue marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselves, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The King himselfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euer where alike; and the day his owne. But hearing the noyse behind him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went: when he beheld his men calling downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; Hee presently betooke himselfe to flight. Neither staid hee afterwards in any place (except onely a small while about Tempe, 40 thereto collect such as were disperfed in this ouerthrow) vntill hee was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armit in this battaile, about seuen hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and fise thousand taken Prisoners.

¶ XV.

T. QVINTIVS saileth out with the Ætoliens; and grants truce vnto PHILIP, with conditions, vpon which the peace is raised. Libertie proclaimed vnto the Greeks. The Romans quarrell with ANTIOCHVS.

10 He Ætoliens wonderfully vanted themselves; and desired to haue it noised through all Greece, That the victorie at Cynosephale was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie; by lacking the Macedonian Campe, whilst the Romans were busied in the chace. Titus therefore being offended both at their vaine glory, and at their rauenous condition, purposed to teach them better maners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceiued, That by vling them with any extraordinary fauor, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Ætoliens much more vehemently, than euer they had done the Macedonians. But 20 this displeasure brake not forth yet awhile.

After the battaile Titus made haste vnto Lysissia Citie of Thessalie: which he presently tooke. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduerfitee, he forgot not to prouide for the safetie of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Lysissia might well perceiue, that hee gaue them as alreadie lost. Wherefore wee finde not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Towne of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleete: and verie soone after, all the 30 Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Ætoliens ever true to Philip; gaue vp themselves vnto the Romans, hearing of the victorie at Cynosephale. The Rhodiens also were then in hand with the conquest of Peras, a Region of the Continent oueragainst their Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treatie of peace with Philip. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greekes: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romans; but with an Armie of their owne, and some helpe which they borrowed of the Achians and other their friends, gaue battaile to Democrates the Kings Leuitenant, wherein they had the victorie, and consequently recovered the whole Prouince. It angered Philip worse than all this, that the Dardaniens gathered courage out of his affliction, to in- 40 uade his Kingdome; wasting and spoyling, as if all had bene abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all haste, of fise thousand foot and fise hundred horse: wherewith coming vpon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprife Hee had successe answerable to his desire; but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdome to yeld vnto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Livinus and Demosthenes, with Cyrtades the banished Achian, in whom hee reposed much confidence, Embassadors vnto Titus. These had conference a long while in priuate, 50 with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seemed that they had Commission, to referre all vnto Titus his owne discretion; as Philip himselfe in few dayes after did. There was granted vnto them a Truce for fiftene dayes; in which time, the King himselfe might come and speake with the Roman General. In the meane season ma-

nie fuspitious rumors went of Titus; as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greekes his Confederates. Of these bruits the Aetolians were chiefe authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honestie, where profit came a wrong way, judged alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters vnto his Associates; willing them to haue their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treatie should be held. There when they were all assembled, they entered into consultation before the Kings arrivall, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of the mall, and for euery Estate in particular. The poore King Amminder besought them all, and especially the Romans, that they would thinke vpon him; and considering his weaknes which he confessed, make such prouision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander one of the Aetolians: who commending Titus for so much as he had thus assembled the Confederates to aduise vpon their owne good, and had willed them to deliuer their mindes freely: added, That in the maine of the purpose which hee had in hand, hee was vtterly decieued: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greekes of their libertie. There was, he said, none other end to be made of the warre, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the faire promises made by Titus himselfe vnto the Greekes, than the chacing of Philip quite out of his Kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Aetolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and People of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the vtter destruction of any King or Nation, at such time as they first made warre with them; vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessitie, to take such a rigorous course. And heerof he alleaged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victorie, to generous mindes, was onely an inducement vnto moderation. As concerning the publicke benefit of Greece: it was (he said) expedient, that the Kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low; not that it should bee vtterly destroyed: forasmuch as it serued as a barre, to the Thracians, Gauls, and a multitude of other sauage Nations, which would soone ouer-flow the whole Continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeld vnto those demands, wherewith he had pressed him in the former Treatie; then was there no reason to denie him peace. As for the Aetolians: if they thought other wise, it should bee at their owne pleasure, to take counsaile apart for themselves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Aetolians, to say, That all was come to nothing; for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greekes, no lesse than hee had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bad him leaue his babbling; saying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip, were he neuer so desirous, should thenceforth not haue it in his power to molest the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus vsed friendly; and suffering him to repose himselfe that night, held a Councell the day following; wherein the King yielded vnto all that had beene required at his hands; offering yet further to stand to the good pleasure of the Senate, if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Aetolian, insulting ouer him, said it was to bee hoped, that he would then at length giue vp to the Aetolians many of townes (which he there named) bidding him speake, whether he would, or not. His answer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himselfe, said it should be otherwise; These were Thessalian Townes, and should all bee free: one of them onely excepted, which not long agoe had refused to commit it selfe to the faith of the Romans, and therefore should now bee giuen to the Aetolians. Heereat Phaneas cried out that it was too great an iniurie, thus to defraud them of the Townes that had sometime

belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Couenant betwene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing saue the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had beene such a Condition in the former warre: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Aetolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vnderstand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the Townes in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be deliuered into subiection of the Aetolians. The rest of the Confederates were verie much delighted, with these angry passages betwene the Roman and the Aetolians: neither had they great reason to feare any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in behalfe of those Thessalians, to giue them libertie, though they had stood out against him, euen till very feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they copped not themselves; but gaue their consent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

The chiefe cause that mooued Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alleadged; was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing nere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motiue; euen the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And hee was in the right: For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alleadging triuolous matter of their owne suspicion, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, betwene the Embassadors of Philip, offering to stand to whatsoever was demanded, and the letters of Titus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side; and the importunitie of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the King would rebell, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assemblie of the People; by whose soueraine authoritie it was concluded, That Peace should be granted vnto the King. So tenne Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had beene Consuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, That Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faire haue retained those three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrius, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better settled. But finally Titus prevailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendered vnto the Athians; and all the other Greece Townes which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next Isthmian Games, He should withdraw his Garrisons out of all the Greece Townes which he held, and consigne them oner to the Romans: That hee should deliuer vp vnto them all Captiues that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of warre, referring to himselfe onely those of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatnesse, wherein fixteene men laboured at euery oare: Further, that hee would pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres next following, by euen portions. Hereto Lucius adds, That he was forbidden to make warre out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he obserued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Foure hundred talents hee had already deliuered vnto Titus, together with his younger sonne Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as hee lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as young Demetrius, who together with those foure hundred Talents was given for hostage, remained still in custodie of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias King of Bithynia: giuing him to vnderstand what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greekes; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoiled and oppressed by Philip to gratifie this Bithynian his sonne-in-law, should be restored to libertie, and permitted to enioy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect these letters wrought it was not greatly materiall; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they 10 had not leisure to examine the conformitie of Prusias to their will.

All Greece rejoiced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Onely the Ætolians found themselves agrieved that they were vnto them neglected; which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bæotians continued to fauour the Macedonians; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselves. There were some among them well-affectèd to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus, saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor which was head of the opposite Faction might be made away. Titus refused to haue an hand in the execution, yet 20 neuertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to haue kept themselves vndiscovered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those that were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoeuer they durst not take armes against them, yet such of them as they found sirraging from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Countrie. This was detected with- in awhile, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bæotians, to haue the murderers deliuered into his hands; and for five hundred soul- driers, which he had lost by them, to haue paid vnto him five hundred Talents. In stead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which he would not 30 take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadours to the Acheans and Athenians, informing them what had happened: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserued. Here withall he falls to wasting their Countrie; and besiegeth two such Townes of theirs, as did seeme to bee most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadours of the Acheans and Athenians, (especially of the Acheans who offered, if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet besought him rather to grant peace vnto the Bæotians) prevailed so farre with him; that he was pacified with thirtie Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some 40 among them reioicing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Ætolians would haue bene glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumors abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne handes all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre serued as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumors when the Silbman games were held, which in time of peace were neuer without great solemnitie and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, 50 caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the Generall, hauing vanquished King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and liuing at their owne Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Eubœans, Acheans of Phibiatis, Magnetians, Thessalians, and Peribœians. The suddenesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their owne cares. The Greekes were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thanks; which they rendered now to T. Quintius with fo great affection, as that they had well-neere smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of all the Greekes, was like to bee much more auailable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue bene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Prouinces which were named in their Proclamation. 10 Vpon confidence heereof, no sooner were these Silbman games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hagesianax and Lysias King Antiochus his Embassadours: whom they willed to signifie vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abtaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vex them with warre: as also to restore whatsoeuer he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomie or Philip. Moreover they willed him by these his Embassadours, that he should not passe ouer his Armie into Europe; adding, That some of them would visit him in person ere it were long, to talke with him further concerning these points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greekes, 20 to the rest they gaue what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Acheans of Phibiatis they annexed vnto the Thessalians; all saue the Towne of Thebes in Phibiatis, the same which had bene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the last Treatie with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earnestly about Pharsalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatorie answer, and rejected vnto the Senate: for howsoeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them; yet was it not meet that they should haue their will, as it were in despite of Titus. So the Acheans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeede (though the Romans yet awhile kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the 30 Achean Commonwealth, enioyed their libertie in as absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were giuen one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip; and vpon Aminander were bestowed those Castles, which hee had gotten from Philip during this Warre; to reigne in them and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had bene their owne Caræers. Attalus was dead a litle before the Victory; and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuen the Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubœa, to his sonne and successeur King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubœians, should be suffered to enioy their libertie. Oressia, a litle Prouince of the Kingdome of Macedon, 40 bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yielded vnto the Romans long ere this; and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at libertie, and made a free estate by it selfe.

These busineses being dispatched: it remained, that all care should be vsed, not how to auoid the war with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadours were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to picke matter of quarrell; and about vnto others, to prædispose them vnto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this King the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadours and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

CHAP. V.

The Warres of the Romans with ANTIOCHVS
the great, and his adherents.

§. I.

What Kings, of the races of SELEVCVS and PTOLEMIE, reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the great.

Polybibl.

SELEVCVS NICATOR, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twentie and fourth Olympiad. Hee was treacherously slaine by Ptolemie Ceraneus, at an Altar called Argos;
hauing (as is saide) bene warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatal place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath bene preferred, or any mischief auoided, by the preditions of such Deuillish Oracles. Rather I beleeue, That many such preditions of the Heathen Gods, haue bene ante-dated by their Priests or by others; which deuised them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearly beloued of his Father: who surrendered vp vnto him his owne wife Stratonica, when hee vnder-stood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolemie Ceraneus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not bee vnuenged by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps onely with faire words; containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ceraneus enioy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the blood of Selecus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his Fathers life; yet out of modestie he forbore to embrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should haue vrged him. Afterwards he had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia.
Also Lutatius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gauls, were set vpon him by 40 the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battaile: wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all advantage against him; yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he wonne the Victorie. Hee tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolemie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he soone gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berenice the Chaldean dedicated his Historie of the Kings of Assyria; the same, which hath since bene excellently falsified by the Frier Annus. He left behind him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie and ninth Olympi-ad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeere of the Kingdome of the Greeces; when he had reigned nineteene yeeres.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos or the god, had this vaine and impious title giuen vnto him, by flatterie of the Chaldeans; whom hee deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult; but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolemie

Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Bere-nice the daughter of Ptolemie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Ladie Berenice, Saint Hierome and other Interpreters haue vnderstood that Prophecie of DANIEL: The Kings daughter of the South, shall come to the King of the North, to make an agreement; and that which fol-loweth.

Ptolemie Philadelphus was a great loue of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arsinoe) a very excellent Prince; how-soever, the worthiest of all that race. It was hee, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria; which to adorne, and to honour the more, hee sent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Iewes, for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly bin very great: for he had set at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in slauerie throughout all Egypt; and hee had sent vnto the Temple of God in Hierusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yielding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolemie caused to be translated into Greeke, by seuen-tie two of the most graue and learned persons, that could bee found among all the Tribes. In this number of the seuentie two Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seuentie; Iesus the sonne of Sirach, is thought by Gombard to haue bene one: who that he liued in this Age, it seemes to me very sufficiently proued by Iansenius in his Preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as Josephus affirms) by Aristas that was employed therein. Fortie yeeres Ptolemie Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein hee ioynly reigned with his Father. Hee was exceedingly beloued of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end hee grew more voluptuous, than hee had bene in his former yeeres: in which time he boasted, that hee alone had found out the way how to liue for euer. If this had bene referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue stood with reason: otherwise, the Gowt, with which hee was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne error. He was the first of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans: as also his Off-spring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolemie. After his second marriage, hee vsed his first wife with no better regard, than if shee had bene his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet aduenced not to seek reuenge; vntill her own sonne Seleucus Cal-licanus was of abilitie to bee King. This was two or three yeeres after the death of Ptolemie Philadelphus: at what time hee poisoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Seleucus her sonne, murdered Berenice, together with a sonne that she had borne to Antiochus. Iustine reports, that Berenice saved herselfe, together with the yong Prince her child, awhile in the Sanctuary at Daphne; and that not onely some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolemie Evergetes, King of Egypt, came to rescue her with an Armie; though too late, for she was slaine before.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeeding vnto his Father that had fifeteene yeeres bene King, beganne his Reigne. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they discovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would haue bene much endangered, if Ptolemie Evergetes, King of Egypt, came against him, had not bene drawne backe into his owne Countie, by some Commotions therein. For there were none that would beare armes against Ptolemie, in defence of their owne King; but rather they sided with the Egyptians; who tooke Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as shee had well deserued. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this inuasion, by occasion of those domesticall troubles which recalled Evergetes home into Egypt; went about a dangerous piece of worke, euen to make Warre vpon his owne subiects, because of their bad affection towards him; when as it had bene much better, by well deserving, to haue changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet hee prepared: in furnishing and manning whereof hee was at such charges, that hee scarce left himselfe any other hope, it that should miscarrie. Herein hee embarked himselfe; and, putting to Sea, met with such a tempest, as deuoured all saue himselfe, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, hauing left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned neuerthelesse to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his Subjects vnderstood, in what sort the Gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, 10 presuming that hee would thenceforth become a new man, offered him their seruice with great alacritie. This reuined him, and filled him with such spirit; as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Egyptian, he made ready a mightie Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, than it had bene at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolemie in a great battaile: whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late shipwracke. Halting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the Enemie would loone bee at his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteen yeeres olde, yet extremely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great.

He leued a mighty Armie of the Gauls; wherewith he set forward to helpe his brother; or rather to get what hee could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertised: and hauing no desire to put himselfe in danger more than needed; tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeeres. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian warre, but his brother Antiochus came vpon him; and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to haue the better Armie. So Seleucus was vanquished againe; and saved himselfe, with so few about him, that he was verily supposed to haue perished in the battaile. Thus did Gods iustice take reuenge of those murders, by which the Crowne was purchased; and settled (as might haue bene 30 thought) on the head of this bloudie King. Antiochus was glad to heare of his brothers death; as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gauls, his Mercenaries, were gladder than He. For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne: these perfidious Barbarians tooke counsaile against him; and deuised how to stripp him of all that hee had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to doe what should best bee pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laide hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransom himselfe with money, as if hee had bene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but 40 made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended little to his honour.
In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie; and prepared once more to trie his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which was no great marvaile; since he had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gauls his owne souldiers, than of the enemie with whom hee had to deale. After this, Eumenes wanne much in Asia; whilst Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battaile, fought betwene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which surname was giuen him, because he fought his prey vpon every one, without care whether hee were prouoked 50 or not) soared away as fure as hee could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gauls. Having fetched a great compassse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes tooke him vp. Hee was entertained very louingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him.

This

This hee soone perceived: and therefore betooke him to his wings againe; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length hee relolued to bestowe himselfe vpon Ptolemie; his owne conscience telling him, what euill hee had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelitie can find no sure harbour. Ptolemie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore hee layd him vp in close prison: whence, though by means of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of the eues, by whom he was murdered. Neare about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against 10 him, during his warres with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Arsaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Arfaces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, hauing euery way giuen him royall entertainment;
but in returning home, he brake his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappy reigne of twenty yeeres. Hee had to wife Laodice, the sister of Androm-achus, one of his most trustie Captaines: which was father vnto that Achus, who making his aduantage of this amitie, became shortly after (as he titled himselfe) King; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice hee had two sonnes; Seleucus the third, surnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, 20 called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeeres: in which time he made warre vpon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of bodie through sick-nesse, and in want of monie, He could not keepe his men of warre in good order: and finally he was slaine by treason of Nicanor, and Apaturnus a Gaul. His death was reuenged by Achus, who slue the Traitors, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully awhile; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Child.

A*NTIOCHVS* was scarcely fifteene yeeres olde, when hee began his reigne, which lasted sixe and thirty yeeres. In his Minoritie, Hee was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which malignd all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful seruants.
This wilde qualitie in a Counsaillour of such great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe; the successe of things will shortly discouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolemie Evergetes King of Egypt died; and left his heire Ptolemie Philopator, a yong Boy likewise, as hath elf-50 where bene remembred. This was that Euergetes, who reliued Aratus and the Achaens: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes; and louingly entertained him, when he was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. Hee annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene; by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race.

The

The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given him by the Egyptians; nor so much for the great spoiles which hee brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered some of those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when hee conquered Egypt, had carried into Persia. He was ready to haue made war vpon the Iewes, for that Omis their high Priest, out of mere couetousnesse of mony, refused to pay vnto him his yeerely tribute of twenty talents: but hee was pacified by the wisdom of Iosephus a Jew, vnto whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which hee held. For Callosyria, with Palestina and all those parts of the Countrey that lay neerer vnto Egypt, were held by the Egyptians; either as hauing fallen to the share of Ptolemy the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battaile at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublefome and vnhappie reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucides, were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemy Euergetes reigned six and twentie yeeres; and died towards the end of the hundred thirtie and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that, which we find in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Sirachides there saith, that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth yeere, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, that either this King reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirtieth yeeres, were the yeeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did otherwise reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Nor long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsaile, and in a manner the Protectour of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Egyptians; for the recovery of Callosyria and the Countreies adioyning. This counsaile was verie vnseasonably giuen; when Molo the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and fought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countrey. Neuertheless Hermias, being more froward than wife, maintained stiffe, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the Kings honour, to send forth against rebellious Captain, other Captaines that were faithful, whilst He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe, a King. No man durst gainsay the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenatas an Achean, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebelle, whilst in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the Kings Expedition into Callosyria. The King hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Defarts into the Vallie of Marfus, betwene the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus, found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Aetolian, that serued vnder Ptoleme. So hee consumed the time there awhile to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenatas, his Capitaine, was destroyed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenatas, whilst he was yet on his journey, and drew neere to the Riuer of Tygris, received many aduertisements, by such as fledde ouer vnto him from the Enemy, that the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against the King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessitie. Xenatas therefore making hew, as if hee had prepared to passe the Riuer by Boats in face of his Enemy; left in the night time such as he thought meete to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment: but hearing that Xenatas could not so bee stopped, He himselfe dislodged, and tooke his iourney towards Media; leaving all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrustful the faith of his owne

fouldiours: or whether thereby to deceiue his Enemy; the great folly of Xenatas made his stratageme prosperous. For Xenatas, hauing borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias by whom he was aduanced vnto this charge; did now presume, that all should giue way to his authoritie, without putting him to much trouble of vsing the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast, with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Campe: or rather hee commanded them so doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vp themselves against the iourney, which hee intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose hee bulied himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Armie, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily returne the same night. Wherefore vnderstanding what good rule the Kings men kept: hee made such haste backe vnto them, that he came vpon them early in the morning; whilst they were yet heauie with the wine and other good cheare, that they had spent at supper. So Xenatas and a very few about him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the rest were slaughtered, without making resistance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Campe on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to save their owne liues. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebelle marched vnto Seleneis, which he presently tooke: and, masticating within a little while the Prouince of Babylonia, and all the Countrey downe to the Red-Sea, or Bay of Persia. He halted vnto Susa; whereat his first comming hee wan the Citie: but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned backe to Seleneis, there to giue order concerning this bulinesse.

The report of these things comming to Antiochus, whilst he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Marfus; filled him with great sorrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counsaile what to doe in this needfull case; and was well aduised by Epigenes the best man of warre hee had about him, to leaue this Enterprise of Callosyria; and bend his forces thither, where more neede required them. This counsaile was put in execution with all conuenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soone after slaine, by the practice of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counsaile giuen, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the iourney against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any oddes which hee had of the Rebel in strength. Molo distrusted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good success, nor any other consideration, would serue to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience; if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him, to assaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discomfited by some that fled ouer from him to the King. This caused him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by some error, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Molo, vpon confidence which hee had that many would reuolt vnto him. Neither was hee deceiued in this his beliefe: For not a few men, or Ensignes; but all the left wing of the Enemy, which was opposite vnto the King, changed side forth with as soone as euer they had sight of the Kings person; and were ready to doe him service against Molo. This was enough to haue wonne the Victorie: but Molo shortened the worke, by killing himselfe; as did also diuers of his friends, who for feare of torments prevented the Hang-man with their owne swords.

After this Victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married vnto Antiochus awhile before, had brought forth a sonne. Fortune seemed bountifull vnto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what vs hee could, other friendly disposition while it lasted: Being now in the Easterne parts of his kingdome, Hee iudged it conuenient to visit his Frontiers, were it onely to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him. Hereunto his Counsaile Hermias gaue assent: not so much respecting the Kings honour;

as considering what good might thereby happen to himselfe. For if it should come to passe, that the King were taken out of the world by any casualty: then made hee no doubt of becoming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Government. Antiochus therefore went against Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropians, hauing the greatest part of his kingdome, situate betwene the Caspian and the Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearefull; and therefore yielded vnto whatsoever Conditions it pleased Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iourney Antiochus got honour, such as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way a Physician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly, how odious hee was vnto the people; and how dangerous he would be shortly vnto the Kings owne life. Antiochus beleued this, hauing long suspected the same Hermias; but not daring, for feare of him, to vtter his suspitions. It was therefore agreed, that he should be made away on the sudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a sleight a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or disputation. The King needed not to haue vsed so much Art, in ridding his hands of a man so much detested. For howfewer hee seemed gracious whilst hee was alive: yet they that for feare had been most obsequious to him, whilst hee was in case to doe them hurt, were as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as hee had deserved, when once they were secure of him: Yea, his wife and children lying then at Apamea, were toned to death by the wiles and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outrageously, the longer that it had been concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of those Expeditions which hee tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a King. His purpose was to haue invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprize; and studie to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange; that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traitorous purposes: but wrote vnto him, signifying that he knew all; and vpbraiding him with so much infidelitie, as any offender might know to be vn pardonable. By these meanes he emboldened the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Callosyria, or what els he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopater in those parts. He began with Seleucia, a very strong Citie neere vnto the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with brybes the Capitaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the great who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Evergetes hauing lately won it, might, if it had so pleased him, haue changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endless memorie vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their owne, than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Aetolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Callosyria in the behalfe of Ptolemie; was now growne forrie, that he had vsed so much faith and diligence, in seruice of an vnthankfull and luxurious Prince. Wherefore, as a Mercinarie, he began to haue regard vnto his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthe of these two Kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrrus and Ptolemais. Whilst he was deuising about this treason, and had already sent messengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Capitaines, that was more faithfull then himselfe. But Antiochus hailing to his rescue, vanquished this Capitaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession,

not onely of Tyrrus and Ptolemais, with a good fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Countrie, as emboldened him to thinke vpon making a iourney into Egypt it selfe. Agathodes and Sosibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemie himselfe being loth to haue his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safetie of his Kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be, for the warre: and neuerthelesse, at the same time, to picke Antiochus with daily Embassadors to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse, Embassadors from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewise from the Stolians; according to the vsuall courtesie of the Greekes, desiring to take vp the quarrell. These were all entertained in Alempsis, by Agathodes and Sosibius: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilst this Treatie lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsaillours perswaded themselves reasonably, that the victory would be their owne; if they could get, for monie, a sufficient number of the Greekes to take their parts. Antiochus heard onely what was done at Alempsis, and how desirous the Governours of Egypt were to be at quiet: wherunto he gaue the readier beliefe, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, and other Embassadors, coming from Alempsis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being all deuiued, by the cunning of Agathodes and his fellow. Antiochus therefore haueing decayed himselfe, at the long siege of a Towne called Dara, which he could not winne: and being desirous to refresh himselfe and his Armie in Seleucia, during the Winter which then came on; granted vnto the Egyptians a Truce for foure moneths, with promise that he would be ready to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they should be offered. It was not his meaning to be so courteous, as he would faine haue seemed, but onely to lull his enemies asleepe, whilst he tooke time to refresh himselfe; and to bring Achæus to some good order, whose treason dayly grew more open and violent. The same negligence which he thought the Egyptians would haue vsed, hee vsed himselfe; as presuming, that when time of the yeere better serued, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeelde vnto him, since Ptolemie provided not for their defence. Neuerthelesse, he gaue audience to the Embassadors, and had often conference with those that were sent out of Egypt: pleasing himselfe well, to dispute about the iustice of his quarrell; which he purposed shortly to make good by the sword, whether it were iust or no. He said, that it was agreed betwene Seleucus his Ancestor, and Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, that all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, should be giuen in possession to Seleucus; and that this bargain was afterwards ratified, by generall consent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Issus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no such bargain. They said, that Ptolemie the sonne of Lagi, had wonne Callosyria, and the Provinces adioyning for himselfe: as also that he had sufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countreies about the Riuer of Euphrates. Thus whilst neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their disputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded restitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Also Ptolemie would needes haue Achæus comprehended in the League betwene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming against it as a shameful thing, that one King should offer to deale so with another, as to take his Rebelle into protection, and seeke to ioine him in Confederacie with his owne Soueraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field againe: contrary to his expectation hee was informed, that Ptolemie, with a very puissant Armie, was coming vp against him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountered on the way by those Capitaines of Ptolemie, that had resisted him

the yeere before. They held against him the passages of Libanus, whence neuertheless he draue them: and, proceeding onward in his iourne, wan so many places, that he greatly increas'd his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neere together: many Captaines of Ptolemie forooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithstanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meete his Enemy in the field. The battaile was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Assatians were the better Souldiers (for that the strength of both Armies consisted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greekes, Thracians, and Gauls) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arinoe his sister¹⁰ and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other side: each of them rehearsing the braue deedes of their Ancestors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to valet themselves. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as also his, being of Asia, had they beene fewer would haue beaten those of Africke. Wherefore by the aduantage of these beasts, hee draue the enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein hee fought himselfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whose valour he brake the Grosse of his Enemies battaile, and wan the victory; whilst Antiochus was heedlesly following vpon those, whom hee had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field aboute seuentie thousand foot, and six thousand Horse: whereof though hee lost scarce ten thousand foote, and not²⁰ four hundred horse; yet the fame of his ouerthrow tooke from him all those places which he had lately wonne. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: hee began to stand in feare, lest Ptolemie and Achæus, setting vpon him both at once, should put him in danger of his whole Estate. This caused him to send Embassadors vnto the Egyptian to treat of peace: which was readily graunted; it being much against the nature of Ptolemie, to vex himselfe thus with the tedious busines of warre. So Ptolemie, hauing staied there moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his subjects, and of all those that were acquainted with his voluptuous and slothfull condition.³⁰

Achæus was not comprised in the League betwene these two Kings: or if hee had beene included therein; yet would not the Egyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second Expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was hee confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby hee had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus; that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Molo the Rebelle had beene, one of meane regard otherwise, and carryed beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Coulin german to the King, as hath⁴⁰ beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a yonger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laudice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whome a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a litle for him, That King Ptolemie of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battaile at Raphia and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarrel betwene his sonnes-in-law, had no reason⁵⁰ to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian: hee was not onely slothfull; but hindred by a rebellion of his owne subjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late Expedition; began to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferior to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had done: since they lesse esteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings Mercenary Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subiection. Thus brake out a warre betwene the King and his subjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the Multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might haue bene spent, as hee thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, he had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he returned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achæus. To this purpose he entred into¹⁰ League with Attalus; that so hee might distract the forces of his Rebelle, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had pent vp Achæus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres besieged. The Citie was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Cattle it selfe was vpon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Cattle, in that part which was called the Sauie, was in like manner situated vpon steepe Rocks, and hardly accessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottome, whereinto the dead carcases of Horses, and²⁰ other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, vied to be throwne. Now it was obserued by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which hanted that place by reason of their lood which was there neuer wanting, vied to flie vp vnto the top of the Rockes, and to pitch vpon the walls; where they rested without any disturbance. Obseruing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were leitt vnguarded, as beeing thought vnapproachable. Heereof hee informed the King: who approued his iudgement, and gaue vnto him the leading of such men, as hee desired for the accomplishing of the enterprize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and, though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those Rockes, and³⁰ (whilst a generall assault was made) entred the Towne in that part; which was, at other times vngarded, then vmthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Craesus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse many ages past; and therefore out of memorie. Achæus held still the Cattle: which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was very well stored with all necessaries; and manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrained to waste much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the vsuall tediousness of expectation; his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians, and *Partians*⁴⁰ with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdomes taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still incroched. But hee thought it not safe, to let Achæus breake loose againe. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolemie the Egyptian, and good friends vnto Achæus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliuer this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more; but presumed, that when he should appeare in the Countries vnder Taurus, he would soone haue an Armie at commaund, and be strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countie, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rockes, whereon the Cattle⁵⁰ of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receiue at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Achæus; to doe his best for performance of their desire. He vnderooke the businesse: and gaue such likely reasons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote vnto Achæus, by one Arrianus, a trustie messenger, whom Bolis found meanes to conueigh into the Cattle. The faith of these Negotiators tiators Achens held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in priuie characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none faue he and they were acquainted: whereby hee knew, that it was no fained deuice of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger; he was a trustie fellow, and one whom Achens found, by examination, heartily affected vnto the fide. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, That hee should bee confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had wonne vnto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; vnder whom he had the command of those Cretians, which held one of the Forts that blocked vp the Cattle of Sardes. Neuerthelesse other way to escape hee saw none, than by putting himselfe to some aduerture. When the messenger had therefore passed often to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speake with Achens, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, saue onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretians, and (as all their Countreimen,

* Some few excepted, haue bene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a consultation together, that was, as Polybius obserues it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safetie of him whose deluerance they vndertooke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most with least adoe and danger to themselves. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share betwene them ten Talents, which they had already receiued in hand: and then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliuer Achens vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present monie, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a seruice, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad; than were the friends of Achens well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get vp into the Castle, and conueigh Achens thence: Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him very priuate audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberal promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithful vnto Ptolemie whom he had long serued; He accompanied Arianus vp into the Castle. At his comming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achens, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But he discouered so well, and with such grauitie; that there appeared no reason of distrustful either his faith or judgement. Hee was an old Souldiour, had long been a Captaine vnder Ptolemie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was invited by honourable and faithfull men. He had also taken a faine course, in winning (as it seemed) that other Countreiman of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundry times giuen safe passage and repassage vnto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an aduerture stirred vp some diffidence. Achens therefore dealt wisely, and said, That hee would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that he meant to fend away with Bolis three or foure of his friends; from whom hee receiued better aduertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would hee issue forth himselfe. Hereby heooke order, not to commit himselfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But, as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he playd the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, That hee had to doe with one, whose knauey could not be auoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had layd their plots thus; That if Achens came forth alone, then should hee easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to leade the way, as one that of late had troden it off; and Bolis following behinde, should haue an eye vpon Achens, to prevent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end that being taken aliue, Hee might bee to Antiochus the more welcome Present.

* Among the few I doe not except one, calling himselfe Eudamius (John Andrew, a Cretian: who in one of his late themselfe li-bels, wherein hee tradueth our King, Religion, and Countrey, with all the good & worthy men of whom hee could learne the money, hath, by inserting my name, twice belied me; in calling me a Puritan, & one that haue bene dangerous vnto my Soueraigne. It is an honour to bee ill spoken of by so many a supporter of Treasons, and Architect of Lies: in regard whereof I may not denie him the commendation of Cretians: no lesse voluminous, than hee in malitipicities of name; beyond any the Cretian in elder times, that were alwayes Iyers, full beasty, and flowbellies, &c. Polybius lib. 8.

sent. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way serued, and Bolis in the Rere. Achens made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified hee the matter to his wife Laodice; and comforting her with hopes as well as hee could, appointed foure of his especiall friends to beare him companie. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to haue knowledge of the Greeke tongue; speaking and answering, as needs should require, for all, as if the rest had been Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuiling vpon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise 10 any thing to the mischiefe of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achens, or whether Achens himselfe were there. The way was very vneale, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to stay in diuers places, and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon euery occasion, they were all of them very officious toward Achens; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that hee was the man: and so by their vnseasonable dutie, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in waite, Bolis whistled, and presently clasped Achens about the middle, holding him fast that hee should not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forth with 20 Antiochus: who late vp watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The sight of Achens, brought in bound vnto him, did so astonish the King, that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was hee before informed of the plot, which might haue kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes assembling his friends together, Hee condemned Achens to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pittie towards this vnhappy man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the raritie of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it bee so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischieuous knaues against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed 30 well; according to that Spanish Prouerbe, A un traydor dos aluados. The death of Achens brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that after a while they gaue vp the place and themselves vnto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his Expedition against the Parthians, and Syrcians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings; and commonly subiect vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government ouer them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard; shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonius; and from him, together with the Medes, to Selenus: vnder whose posteritie they continued until the Reigne of Selenus Callicene, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustfull insolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callicene, that was vanquished and thought to be slaine by the Gauls; did stirre vp Artaces, a Noble man of the Countrie, to seek reuenge of iniuries done, and animate him to rebell. So hee slue the Kings Lieutenant, made himselfe King of the Parthians, and Lord of Syrcia; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Selenus Callicene prisoner in battaile, whom he royally entertained, and dismissed. Hereby he wanne reputation as a lawfull King; and by good government of his Countrey, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his subjects, that his name was continued vnto his Successors, 50 like as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt, and that of the Caesars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucida beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians Dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an Armie, that they durst not meet him in plaine field; but kept themselves in Woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and passages of Mountaines. The resistances they made auailed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well sorted, as hee needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods and Streights betweene their Mountaines; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compasse about, might either get about the Enemies heads, or come behinde, and charge them on the backe. Thus did he often employ against them his light armature: wherewith hee caused them to dislodge, and giue way vnto his Phalanx; vpon which they durst not aduenture themselves in open ground. Asiaces, the second of the name, (for his Father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelitie of his owne subjects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an invader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and Defarts, would haue caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to giue ouer the journey, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out; He caused the Wel and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his Enemy must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoyle. By which means, and thereliance before spoken of, when he could no preuaile, Hee withdrew himselfe out of the way; suffering the Enemy to take his pleasure for a time, in walling the Countrey: wherein, without some victory obtained, hee could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Asiaces was nothing strongly provided for the warre. Wherefore hee marched through the heart of Parthia: and then 20 forward into Hyrcania; where hee wanne Tambrace, the chiefe Cite of that Province. This indignitie, and many other losses, caused Asiaces at length, when hee had gathered an Armie that seemed strong enough, to aduenture a battaile. The issue thereof was such, as gaue to neither of the Kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Asiaces craued Peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subiect.

The next Expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but hauing gotten the Kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Euthydemus he fought a battaile by the Riuer Arus, where hee had the victory. But the victorie was not so greatly to his honour; as was the testimonie which he gaue of his owne priuate valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to haue demeaned him more courageously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His Horse was slaine vnder him; and hee himselfe receiued a wound in his mouth, whereby hee lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himselfe backe into the further parts of his Kingdome, and afterwards protracted the Warre, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was vniuistly vsurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That hee had wonne it from the children of the Vsarpers: and further, 40 That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, saue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered vpon the Scythians, with whom if they should ioyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his Father as Embassador in this Treatie of Peace, was not a little auaileable vnto a good Conclusion: For Antiochus liked him so well, that hee promised to giue him in marriage one of his owne daughters: and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the Kingdome; causing him neuertheless to deliuer vp all his Elephants; as also to binde himselfe by 50 oath, to such Couenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leauing the Bactrian in quiet, made a journey ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where hee renewed with Sophaganeus, King of the Indians, the societie that had been betweene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subject vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his Warre against Antigonus, rayled part of their Countrey. But when Antigonus after his victorie turned Westward, and was ouer-buried in a great ciuill Warre: then did one Sandroctottus, an Indian, stirre vp his Countrey to Rebellion; making himselfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him as Protector of their libertie. This Office and Title hee soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maietie of a King. Finally hee got vnto himselfe, (hauing an Armie of fixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yetas much of it as had bene Alexanders. In this Estate hee had well confirmed himselfe, ere Seleucus Nicator could find leisure to call him to account. Neither did Hee faint, or humble himselfe, at the coming of Seleucus: but met him in field, as ready to defend his owne; so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and amitie with him, taking only a reward of fiftie Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of loue betweene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to haue some treasure sent after him; which hee left one to receiue. Thus parted these two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any bulinnesse worthe of remembrance with the Westerne Countreies. The posteritie of Sandroctottus, is thought to haue retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Angustus Caesar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadors with Presents, and an Epistle written in Greece; wherein, among other things, Hee saide, That Hee had command ouer fixe hundred Kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome in diuers Ages, euen vnto the time of Constantine the great: being all peraduenture of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophaganeus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiuing Presents; and after marched home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the 30 higher side of Taurus, humbled themselves vnto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his owne Greatnesse within few yeeres ensuing, by presuming to stand vpon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same in deed, that his was onely in seeming.

His Expedition being finished; Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe awhile, and studie which way to conuert the terror of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeeres Ptolemie Philopator died: leauing his sonne Ptolemie Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdome; unlikely by him to be well defended, against a neighbour so mightie and ambitious. This Ptolemie surnamed Philopator, that is to say, a lover of his Father, is thought to haue had that surname given him in more derision; as hauing made away both his Father and Mother. may may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beautillesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to haue done any mischief, whereof he could be accused. Hauing wonne the battaile at Raphia, He gaue him selfe ouer to sensuality: & was wholly gouerned by a Strumpet called Agathodes. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister; which had aduentured herselfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him vnderaken and performed with honor. The Lieutenant-ships of his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, and Offices whatsoever, were wholly referred to the disposition of this Agathodes, and her brother Agathocles, and of Oenanthe a filthie Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to the great griefe of all the Countrey, till Philopator died: who hauing reigned seuentee yeeeres, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanes a child of five yeeeres old, begotten on Arinoe that was his siter and wife. After the Kings death; Agathodes beganne to take vpon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Gouernour of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinarie forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemie the first, and would not bee accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth vnto them his siter Agathodes, with the yong King in her armes; beganne a Iolenne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their King, had committed the child into the armes of his siter, but vnto the 20 faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole fate of the Kingdome did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would bee faithfull, and, as great need was, defend their King against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traictrously went about to set the Diademe vpon his owne head, being a meere stranger to the Royall blood. Herewithall hee produced before them a witnesse, that should iustifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting of teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew nor how greatly hee was hated. And so brake vp the 30 Assembly: Hee that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathodes therefore, whom the old Kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wife nor well qualified; thought to goe to worke, as had formerly bene his manner, by vsing his authoritie, to the suppression of those that hee distrusted. Hee haied out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; & cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilst they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and vtter one to another their mindes; wherein they had conceiued extreme hate, against these pernicious misgouernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present iniurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moued with feare of 40 harme; which, in way of requittall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For He was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernment, as afterwards hee proued; yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motiues wrought with the people: so by the remedie which Agathodes vsed, were the Macedons more basely, and more violently stirred vnto vpror. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom he suspected of conspiracie against him; and deliuered him vnto a follower of his owne, to be examined by torture. This poore souldior was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparell to be tormented. But whilst the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the Minister of Agathodes, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome; leauing Moeragenes the Souldior alone by himselfe, and the doores open. Hee perceiving this, naked as 45 he

he was, conneighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians; of whom hee found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turkes Janizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellows had thus bene vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse ado than the Souldiours, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: her Sonne and Daughter staid in the Court, vntill the King was taken from them; and they, 10 by his permission which hee easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathodes himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His siter was dragged naked vp and downe the threets; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of iustice; biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochus; who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire, to get what part he could of the childes 20 estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopator in the Punick Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them theretore the Egyptians addressed themselves, and craued helpe against these two Kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into cōuenant to diuide betwene them, all that belonged vnto this Orphan; whose Father had bene Confederat with them both. So M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; Hee was very soone found bulied, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Ætolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not find: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that Hee was sent thither onely one of the 30 three Embassadors, in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath bene shewed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie; where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, He subdued the Iewes who seeme to haue yielded themselves a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiuing helpe from Egypt. But it was not long, ere all these Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next yeeere following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeeere that Philip was beaten at Cyncephala; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recovered all that had bene lost. Among the rest, the Iewes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated. 40

The Land of Egypt this great King did forebore to invade; and gaue it out, that he meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolemie: either hoping, as may seeme, that the Countrey would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarrie; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Westerne parts of Asia, whilst Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appeares that he was very much distracted, hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betwene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to afford him great aduantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellepont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath bene declared, seemed easie to be swallowed vp at once. One while therefore hee tooke what hee could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Iewes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make inuasion vpon Attalus his Kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embas- 50 sadors, ladours, and delighted from that enterprife. Having thus farre gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amitie betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpast, that these his Embassadors were lovingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not as yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights 10 with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolemie; yet withall hee sends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit hee can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, How notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their Kingdomes, he offered one of his daughters to Ptolemie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendships, at one and the same time, when he sought to make each of them a spoile. This was hee acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplorable desire of repugnancies, which is a disease of great, and ouer-swelling for-unes. Howsoever it was, He sent an Armie to Sardes by Land, vnder two of his owne sonnes: 20 willing them there to stay for him; whilst he himselfe with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Aegyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodiens, that, whilst the war of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they adu-entured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Emassage: whereby they gaue him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meete him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because hee should not ioyne with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King: yet he tempered himselfe, and 30 without any shew of indignation gaue a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embassadors; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire, to renew the ancient Confederacies betweene his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his coming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his verie good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better prooffe, than the entertainment and answer by them newly giuen to his Embassadors.

The Rhodiens appeare to haue been a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what 40 had passed betweene his Embassadors and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynosephala. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; vnlesse the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolemie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to bee at quiet. Hercin also they did well; for that they had cuer been greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolemies. They therefore, in this time of necessitie, gaue what aid they could vnto all the subiects of the Aegyptian in those parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the warre that followed, betweene Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow 50 one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: He excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Antalus and Philercus, his brethren, wondered at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make warre vpon Antiochus; and therein finally pre-uaile.

uaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstayning from this affinity, it should be in his power to ioyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if hee leaned to Antiochus: as he must be partaker in his overthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mightie neighbour, if he happened to win the victorie.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where hee tooke such order as hee thought convenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampacus to obedience; that had vsurped their libertie, and oblinately strove to maintaineir, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring hee sailed vnto the 10 Hellespont: where hauing won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, hee passed ouer into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went hee to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and destroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garrison thence, to employ it in the Roman warre. The Aetolians objected as a crime vnto Philip, in the Conference before T. Quintius, that hee had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting thereinto a Garrison. Hercunto Philip made answer, that his Garrison did not oppress the Towne, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good and substantiall, though it were not accepted as such; might 20 appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his coming thither. For the Towne was vtterly razed by the Barbarians; and the people, carried away into slavery. Wherefore the King tooke order to haue it reedified: as also to redeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Countie thereabout. Likewise hee was careful to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants; and to replenish the Citie with the wonted frequentie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from coming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians; hee tooke a iourne in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Armie; leaving the other halfe to repair the Citie. These paines hee tooke; partly in regard of the 30 conuenient situation, and former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer and establish the dominion in those parts, which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his Kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition hee shall dearely pay: and as after that victorie against Lysimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the Kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconquest of the same Countie, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

¶ IIII.

40 The Romans hold friendly correspondence with ANTIOCHVS, during their warre with PHILIP: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of HANNIBAL at Carthage: whence hee is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight vnto the King ANTIOCHVS. The Aetolians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Acheans, with NABIS the Tyrant of Lacedaemon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. QVINTIVS his Triumph. Peace denied to ANTIOCHVS by the Romans.

50  Or the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of war with Antiochus, whereof notice was alreadie taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre; so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprife of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speake for him; because the one of these Kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did thereafterwards passe between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus, at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inuasion from the Kingdome of Pergamus: also verie shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whilest as yet they were builed with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or mozt of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients vnto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worfe, but more plaine, meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsaillors sent from Rome, requited (as hath bene shewed before) with a commination of warre, this kings gratulation of their victorie; as also his long-proffessed amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

* ch. 4. §. 11.

These ten Counsaillors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, hee was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselves to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnmindfull of the busines: wherein left T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome of purpose, to deale with the King about those controuersies, that were betweene him and Ptolemie. What other priuate instructions Cornelius had; wee may coniecture by the manning of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having bene sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastned thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsaillors) from Bargilla, to be present at the Conference. Hegesianax and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few dayes Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment betweene him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolemie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Herevnto he added, and that very earnestly, That hee must also giue vnto the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could bee more absurd, than such folly in the Romans; as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherein they had laboured so much, and He done nothing? Further He warned the King, that hee should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally Hee demaunded of him, vpon what reason hee was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iouissance there was none probable, than a purpose to make war vpon the Romans. To this the King made answer, That hee wondered why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking vpon the matters of Asia: where with He praied them to let him alone; euen as He, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his coming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what busines had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recourie of Townes to him belonging in Thrace and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that Countrey, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victorie against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie

betweene him and the other Kings, had bene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Aegyptians; but had bene seized on by them, or by others from whom they receiued them, at such times as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countreies, were hindered by multiplicitie of busines, from looking vnto all that was their owne. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in feare of him, as if hee intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bellow this Cite vpon one of his sonnes, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Aegypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himselfe, and to ioyne ere long with Ptolemie, not only in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius haue heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refuse it; would needs heare further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampascus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampascus being called in, began a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them holde their peace; forasmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laide their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace; were doubtfull how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boisterous Gallio-Greekes, pretend only the goodnesse of their swords; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greekes an opinion of their iustice, forbear the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was wearie of these tedious ghesits; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolemie was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Aegypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome; and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Countrey in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassador, both to Antiochus and to Ptolemie: which gaue him occasion to take leaue, and prepare for his Aegyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the King forthwith made readie, to be in Aegypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus hee committed his Armie; and left him to ouer-see the building of Lysimachia; but all his Sea forces Hee tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence hee sent Embassadors to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of Peace, after such sort, as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage; He was perfectly informed that Ptolemie was aliue. This made him beare another way from Aegypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grieuous shipwracke, made him, without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recovered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where hee wintered: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treatie at Lysimachia, (at leastwise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had bene sent vnto the Macedonian gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; Not to rest contented with the Peace which was graned vnto him by the Romans, but to desire societie with them, whereby they should bee bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainly, did not meane to be satisfied with weak excuses. Inlike manner some of the Greekes were sollicit; and particularly the Atolians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the People of Rome. It was needfull to say plainly ly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward answer made by the Aetolians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victorie, as they had bene during the Warre. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out, that they had bene wronged, and defrauded of what was promised vnto them: vpraying withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not only for their Victorie ouer Philip; but euen for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they neuer could haue done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and vtter their griefes; and then should all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended against Antiochus. The same hereof arriving at Carthage, gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate; and to chace out of their Citie this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. Hee had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Ciuill administration; and giuen them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the sway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing subiect vnto them, the lues, goods, and fame of all the rest. Neither did they vse this their power with moderation: but conspired in such wise together, that who so offended any one of them, should haue them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was sure to be soone accused and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the Citie, Hannibal was chosen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though hee was superiour vnto them during that yeere: yet had it not bene their manner to beare much regard vnto such an annual Magistrate, as at the yeeres end must be accomptable to them, if sought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore sending for one of the Questors, or officers of the Treasurie, to come and speake with him: the proud Questor set lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the aduersè Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to bee chosen into the Order of Iudges: in contemplation whereof, hee was filled already with the spirit of his future Greatnesse. But he had not to doe with such a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal sent for him by a Pursuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publique assemblie of the people. There he not onely shewed, what the vndutiful stubbornnesse of this Questor had bene; but how vsufferable the insolencie of all the Iudges at the present was: whose vnbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magistrates. To this Oration when hee perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and fauourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which passed with the generall good likings; That the Iudges should be chosen from yeere to yeere, and no one man be continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had bene passed, before he passed ouer Ibeis: it would not perhaps haue bene in the power of Hanno, to haue brought him vnto necessitie of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leuie by Taxation layed vpon the whole Commonaltie; as wanting money in their publique Treasurie, wherewith to defray eyther that, or diuers other needefull charges. Hannibal considering this, beganne to examine the publique Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treasurie, by wayes and meanes whatsoeuer; and in what fort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinarie charges of the Common-wealth did not exhaust the Treasurie: but that wicked Magistrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greatest part of the monies to their owne vse, were thereby faine to load the people with needlesse burdens. -Hereof he made such plaine demonstration, that these Robbers of the common Treasurie were compelled to refore, with shame, what they had gotten by knauerie: and so the Carthaginians were freed from the necessitie of making such poore shifts, as formerly they had vsed, when they knew not the valew of their owne Estate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: so they of the Roman Faction, which had, since the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extremely: as being by him stript of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authoritie, both at once, euen when they thought themselves to haue been in full possession of the vanquished Carthage. Wherefore they sent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by multitude, and robbing the Treasurie, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with some: these enemies to the Barchines might well crye out, That hauing done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alledge, than their owne inuentions: they said, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beaist, which would neuer be tamed: That secret messages past betwene him, and King Antiochus: and that hee was wont to complaine of idlenesse, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters crailty, euery one to the beil of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to haue admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppress, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him, the Man, against whom in warre they had not of long time preiudil, nor vsed their Victorie in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal, and were glad to haue found it. Three Embassadors they sent ouer to Carthage, C. Serulius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus, whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming; and, being by them instructed how to carrie themselves, gaue out, That they were sent to end some controuersies, betwene the Carthaginians and Misiansis. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall vpon the Romans, that hee knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to say, That hee escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Hauing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, Hee went forth of the Towne when it beganne to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. Hee had appointed Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, Hee came to a Towre of his owne by the Sea-side. There had hee a Ship furnished with all things needfull, as hauing long expected the necessitie of some such journey. So Hee bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrie, more than his owne. Passing ouer to the Ile of Cerina, he found there in the Haven some Merchants ships of Carthage. They saluted him respectfully: and the chiefe among them beganne to enquire, whether hee was bound. He said, Hee went Embassador to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Iland to make a sacrifice; whereto Hee inuited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Shippes. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would needs hold his Feast vpon the shore; where, because there wanted conert, He made them bring thither all their sailes and yards to be vsed instead of Tents.

They did so; and sealed with him till it was late at night: at which time hee left them there asleepe; and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, Hee was sure not to bee pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haile to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassador: neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as

K k k k k k

made most speed homeward, get away from Cecina; being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the mill of so great a person was diversely contrived. Some guessed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had been scene: and then the Roman Embassadors, having none other errand thither, accused him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they onely discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; mistaking the while their purpose, and causing men to vnderstand, that Hee fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal, comming to Tyre, the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity betwene their Citie, thought themselves to haue interest. Thence went hee to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his sonne in Daphne: who friendly welcommed him, and lent him vnto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly reioyced at his comming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to bee therefore forie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrey. For it would not prooue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make stout souldiours of base Asiatiques; as it had been by his trayning and discipline, to make very seruiceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gauls, and other Nations, that were hardie though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a desolate and banished man, than had been the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those Actions wherein hee had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely helpe to ennoble the Roman Victorie: or if it further serued to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse carefull to avoid the warre; then should it further serue, to iustifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemed indeed, that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, having newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that he had any meaning to take Armes; vnlesse by meere violence hee were there-to enforced. Onely the Ætolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of inuasion, and therefore practising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeale them; they had of late been answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsaillours, That the Senate would grant them whatsoeuer with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and vnaudited. For when their Embassadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselves: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of warre with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrey. For the Ætolians were wont to vpbraide the rest of the Greekes, with the vaine libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Delinckers had layd heavier fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, That it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greekes their chaine, & tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no de-

laie, in accomplishment of that which was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrey at peace, both with the Romans, and with it selfe. As for Antiochus; He made it his daily suit, That the Peace bee a scene him and Rome, such as it was, might be continued, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neuertheless T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize vpon Greece, as soone as hee and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, He retained still in his owne hands Chalcis, Pemecris, and the A-crocrinthus: by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suitable vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the tenne Embassadors, that had been sent ouer to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would questionlesse fall vpon Greece: wherein he should finde not onely the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, readie to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilest Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intuentue to his businesse. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprize in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and the Hannibal. For the present, the businesse with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarryance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereat also hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be sorry; though for his owne part, hee wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendship with him, two or three yeeres before this, as is already shewed, whilest hee had Warre with Philip: and had further bene contented for the Romans sake to bee at peace with the Acheans; neither since that time had hee done any thing, whereby hee should draw vpon himselfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a detestable Tyrant, and hated of the Acheans; as one, that besides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great mischief. Titus therefore had a plausible Theme, whereon to discourse before the Embassages of all the Confederate Citie; Which hee caused to meete for that purpose at Corinth. He told them, That in the warre with Philip, not onely the Greekes, but the Romans themselves, had each their motives apart (which hee there briefly rehearsed) that should stirre them vp, and cause them to be earnest. But in this which hee now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other interest, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in setting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in some sort maimed, or incomplete, whilest the noble Citie of Argos was let in subiection to a Tyrant; that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duly to consider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to be vnderaken; or whether otherwile to auoid all further trouble, they could bee well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themselves. The Athenian Embassadour made answer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleasing as he could deuise. He gaue thanks to the Romans for what was past; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Proposition: wherein vnrequested they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement request of their poore Associates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was to heare, such notable vertue and high deserts ill spoken of by some: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imaginations to foretell, what harme these their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankfulness rather would haue required an acknowledgement,

K k k k k 2 ment,

ment, of the benefits and pleasures already received. Every one found the meaning of this last clause, which was directly against the Aetolians. Wherefore Alexander the Aetolian rose up, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in those times when their Citie had bene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recouerie of the libertie generall: from which honour they were now so farre fallen, that they became Parasites vnto those whom they thought most mighty; and by their base assentation, would lead all the rest into seruitude. Then spake Hee against the Achaens, Clients that had been a long time vnto the Macedonian; and souldiers of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduersitie. These, Hee said, had gotten Corinth, and must now haue warre be made for their sakes, to the end that they might also bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Aetolians, that had first made warre with Philip, and alwayes been friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of some places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did hee thus containe himselfe, but objected vnto the Romans fraudulent dealing: so far as much as they kept their Garrisons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; hauing been alwayes wont to profess, That Greece could neuer bee at libertie, whilst those places were not free. Also now at last, what else did they seeke by this discourse of warre with Nabis, than businesse wherewith to finde themselves occupied, that so they might haue some seeming cause of abiding longer in the Countrey? But they should doe well, if they meant as they spake, to carrie to their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Aetolians themselves did promise, and would undertake, That they would either cause him to yeeld to reason, and relinquish Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garrison; or else compell him by force of Armes, to submitt himselfe to the good pleasure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. These words had been reasonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common libertie wrought so much with these Aetolians; as did their owne rauenous desire of oppressing others, and getting vnto themselves, that worse would vse it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had lost. Neither could they well dissemble this; making it no small part of their grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been covenanted, That the Romans should enioy the spoile of all, but leaue the Townes and Lands in possession of the Aetolians. This, and the remembrance of a thousand mischiefs by them done in former times, made the whole Assembly, especially the Achaens, cry out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take such order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Aetolian theues be enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleasure of Titus: who saw, that by discountenancing the Aetolians, He was become the more gracious with all the rest. But whether it pleased him so well, that Antiochus his Embassadors did presently after lie hard vpon him, to drawe the peace to some good conclusion, it may be greatly doubted. Hee cast them off with a slight answer: telling them, That the ten Embassadors or Counsaillours which had bene sent vnto him from Rome, to be his assistants in these matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedemonian warre: it was very soone ended. For Titus vsed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation against Nabis, both by Land and Sea; as if he should haue had to doe with Philip. Besides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Nauie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the seruice: as also Philip of Macedon sent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get fauour of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in seeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the most forward in this Expedition were the Achaens, who set out ten thousand Foote, and a thousand Horse. As for the Aetolians: rather to hold good fashion, and found their dispositions, than in hope to speed, their helpe was required; whereof they excused themselves as well as they thought best. Thus are the Achaens now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing remooued the Aetolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themselves hereafter (though not in all haste) shall be supplanted of the same Lacedemonians, against whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argiues more bold then vey, began a conspiracie against the Lacedemonians that held their Towne; meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neare, they were all detected and slaine: excepting a very few, that escaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, cauled the Arme to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no stirre within the Walles: the execution done vpon the first mouers, hauing terrified all the rest of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to assaile Nabis in the head of his strength at Lacedamon, than to consume time about other places; especially at Argos: for the freedom wherof since the Warre was made, pittie it were, that the calamities of the warre should thereon fall most heauily.

Nabis had in readinesse an Arme of fiftene thousand, whereby to defend himselfe against these Inuaders. Five thousand of them were Mercenaries: the rest, of his owne Countrey; but such as were of all others the worst, as manumitted slaues, malefactors and base peasants, vnto whom his Tyrannie was beneficiall. Of these good and worthy Citizens hee stood in doubt, and since he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an Assembly: and compassing them round in with his Arme, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themselves; they might, he said, hope the better to withstand the common Enemy. But forasmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occasions, to raise tumults, and worke dangerous treason: it seemed vnto him the safest, and (withall) the mildest course, to arreist beforehand, and put in ward, all those whom he found most reason to suspect. So should he keepe them innocent perforce; and thereby preserve not onely the Citie and his owne person from danger, but them also from the punishment, which else they might haue incurred. Hereupon hee cites and apprehends about fourescore of them; whom hee leads away to prison, and the next night puts them all to death. Thus was he sure that they neither should offend, nor yet breake loose. As for the death of them, if it should happen to be noised abroad: what could it else doe than terrifie the people; who must thereby vnderstand, that it was a mortall crime to be suspected? And to the same purpose his cruelty extended it selfe vnto some poore wretches: whom hee accused of a meaning to flee to the Enemy. These were openly whipt through all the streetes, and slaine. Hauing thus alighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. Hee welcomed them with a sallice: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiours of the Towne had the better at first; but were at length repelled with losse. Titus abode not many dayes before Sparta: but ouer-ran the Countrey; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the same time with King Eumenes and the *Rhodian*s, layd siege vnto Gythium, the onely or principall Hauen-towne that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treason. There were two Governours within the Towne equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or desire of reward, had a purpose to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being somewhat more faithfull, due the Traitor; after whose death, he himselfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Arme came thither to Gythium: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the uttermost, and awate what either Time or his Master might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in safety to Sparta with his Garrison. Pythagoras, the sonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government with a thousand Souldiours Mercenaries, and two thousand Argines: it being (as may seeme) the Tyrants purpose, to relieue Gythium: which he thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was lost, then began they to thinke vpon finishing the warre, by some reasonable Composition. Pythagoras therefore was sent his Embassador to Titus: requesting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and speake with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant spake very reasonably for himselfe: prouing, that hee suffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments; whereof the summe was, That whatsoeuer they now did, or could obiect vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon he inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cause by them alleadged, they ought to make warre vpon him; since Argos, and all other their allegations whatsoeuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more neede of him, from entering into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintus was not herewith satisfied. Hee charged him with Tyrannie; and gaue instance, as easily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, so far as much as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that some other cause of this Inuasion should be alleadged. Wherefore he said further, That this Tyrant had occupied Messene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to ioyne with Philip; when he was their enemy, not only in League, but also in affinitie: and that his Fleete had robbed many of their ships, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracie, since in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no restitution mentioned, other than of ships, by him taken from the Greekes his neighbours, with whom he had long held warre: it may seeme to haue bene objected, onely by way of Complement, and to encrease the volume of those complaints, that were otherwise very frivolous. As for Messene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betwene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to haue bene mentioned. All this it seemes that Ariflanus, the Pretor of the Achaens, verie well perceived: who therefore doubting lest the Romans, (that were wont to talke so much of their owne iustice, honour, and faithfull dealing) should now relent, and forbear to molest him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate; and had neuer done them wrong: framed his discourse to another end. He entreated Nabis to consider well of his owne estate; and to settle his fortunes, whilest he might doe it without hazzard: alleadging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to surrender their Estates, and liued in great securitie, honour, and happines, as priuate men. Thus they discouraged vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquish Argos; and requested them, to deliver vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counsaile with his friends. The issue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates must bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making short worke) before the Citie of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon such Conditions as Titus should thinke meete. Besides the restitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending: Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and some of them very grievous. Hee would not suffer the Lacedemonian to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that land or else where; nor to build any Towne or Castle vpon his owne Lands; nor to keepe any other shipping, than two small Barks; besides many other troublesome iniunctions; with imposition of an hundred talents in siluer to be paid out of hand, and fiftie talents yearly, for eight yeeres next ensuing. For obseruance of these Covenants he demanded fise hostages, such as he himselfe should name; and one of them to be the

the Tyrants owne sonne. If it had bene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, because it was not grounded vpon iustice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which hee himselfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reasonable, to dispense a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound vnto the state of their best friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then should this enterprize, when once it was taken in hand, haue bene prosecuted vnto the very utmost. As for this middle course which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themselves by the spoile of one that had not offended them: nor pleasing to the Achaens, who iudged it euill after a great blemish to the noble acts of Titus: so did it minister vnto the Aetolians, and to such as curiously pried into the faults of those which tooke vpon them to bee Patrons of Greece, no barren Subject of malicious discourse. For since Philip, a King, and descended of many famous Kings, might not bee suffered by these Maltierly Romans, to hold any one of those Countries or Townes in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Ancestors: it was thought very strange, that Lacedemon, once the most famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the same Romans left in possession of a Tyrant, that had vsurped it but yesterday: and Hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other side thought himselfe vnmiserically dealt withall, by the selfe-same Romans, whose amitie he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinitie of the Macedonian King, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But fallily had he dealt with the Macedonian: and fallily was he dealt with by those, to whom he did betake himselfe. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him; save onely that for the banished Lacedemonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe, hauing among them Agellipolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a yong childe was driuen out by Lyseus, the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to haue them restored vnto their Citie and Estates; but onely leaue required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to liue abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore hee forbore to giue consent vnto their demands: and sustained an assault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would loone be wearie. But his fearefull nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these iniuries had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had bene propounded, Hee deliuered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, Hee thought the Romans more wicked than himselfe; and was readie vpon the first advantage, to doe them all mischief that he could.

The Argines had heard newes that Lacedemon was euen at point of being taken: This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to set vpon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remooue of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras, to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly should set their hands to the getting of it; which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintus to Argos, where hee was joyfully welcommed. Hee was deferuedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, wheront the Citizens had laied hold without staying for him: and that hee might the better entitle himselfe thereto, he caused the libertie of the Argines to be proclaimed at the Neamean games; as ratifying it by his authoritie. The Citie was annexed againe to the Countie of Achaia; whereby the Achaens were not more strengthened, than the Argines themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little busines or none wherewith to set on worke his Armie in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassador to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance who-

ly disposed vnto quiet; Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vninsincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætoliens, were held as considerations worthie of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making Warre. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of consulting the Ætoliens, and of thoroughly persuading all the Greekes (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to allure vnto themselves the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrie, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation vnto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where hee meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted vnto them all that had passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsaile; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly hee gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Acheans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to doe the like (which verie soone hee did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be knowne, what liers the Ætoliens were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With joyfull acclamations did the Greekes tellie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had bin sold into their Countrie by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happie end: and by leaving the Countrie before his departure was vrge, left therein behind him the memorie of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by ielousie and suspicion of any euill meaning. At his coming to the Citie, hee had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three dayes together the shew of his pompe continued: as being set out with the spoiles of a Countrie, more abundant in things worthie of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Silver: some in the rude Masse vnwrought; some, in diuers sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of sundrie kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteene Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages; among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were 40 principall. After him followed his Armes; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slavery in Greece.

Not long after his Triumph; He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answers, excepting those of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the tenne that had bene his Counsaillors; because their businesse was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadours wondred. They said vnto Titus and his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexitie of their message. For all Treaties of 50 peace and friendship, were either betwene the Victor and the vanquished; betwene those, that hauing warred together, were vpon equall termes of aduantage; or betwene those that had liued alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeild; and patiently endure the

the imposition of some Coucnants, that else might seeme vnreasonable. Where Warre had been made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vsuall to demand and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could agree. But betwene those which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of establishing friendship to be propoed: since it was reasonable, that each part should hold their owne; and neyther carrie it selfe as superiour vnto the other, in prescribing ought that might bee troublesome. Now of this last kind, was the League and friendship that had bene so long in conclusion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being so; they held it strange, that the Romans should thus insit on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to prescribe vnto the King, what Cities of Asia he should set at libertie; from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes; eyther putting, or not putting, his Garrisons into them, as the Senate should thinke fit. Hereto Quintius answered, That since they went so distantly to worke, hee would also doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choice whether to accept: Eyther that it should be lawfull for the Romans, to take part in Asia with any that would seeke their friendship; Or, if King Antiochus disliked this, and would haue them forbear to meddle in Asia, that then hee should abandon whatsoeuer hee had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing; but no 20 reasonable nor pertinent answer, to that which the Kings Embassadours had propounded. For if the Romans might behiold to abstaine from Asia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe; then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampsaes, or any other Asiatiques, whom they were pleased to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make warre with a King that sought their loue, and had neuer done them iniurie. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great shame be so base, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lysimachia, whereon of late he had bin at so much cost; in building it vp euen from the foundations, and repeopleing it with inhabitants, that had all bene disperfed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And so much the Embassadours with great indignation 30 alleaged: saying, that Antiochus desired friendship of the Romans; but so, as it might stand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cause were farre the superiour. For it was, they said, their purpose, to set at libertie those Townes, which the King would oppress and hold in subjection: especially since these Townes were of Greeks blood and language; and fell in that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had afforded vnto all Greece besides. By this colour they might soone haue left Antiochus King of not many subiects on the hither side of Euphrates. Neyerth did they forbear to say, That, vnlesse he would quit what hee held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect those which relied vpon them in Asia, but therein to make new Alliances: 40 namely (as might bee vnderstood) with such as were his subiects. Wherefore they vrge his Embassadours to come to a point, and tel them plainly which of these two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadours could not hereto make, little wanted of giuing presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be entreated, and were contented once againe to send ouer P. Villius, and others that had bene already with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receiue a finall answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitlesse Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans, all that while, no 50 disposition to let him liue in peace.

p. V.

Of the long Warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. PORCIVS CATO. Injuries done by MASSA to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for iustice in waie.

ch. 5. §. 5. of this Booke.

THe Infubrians, Boians, and other of the Cisalpine Gaules, together with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italie, euen from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill such time as they themselves were vterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the height of their Empire. These Nations, hauing serued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader vnto them all, as hath bene already shewed; by this their fellowship in Armes, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did stirre alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first preuailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpina now called Lombardie; it hath bene long since rehearsed, betweene the first and second Punic Warres. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the reconquest would haue bene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase; if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre had not bene distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, hauing an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of bodie; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight againe. Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of streight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor besieged. They were also very poore; and had little or nothing that might giue contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoile their Land. In these respects they serued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiours to hardnesse and militarie patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territorie of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begunne, seemes to haue bene grounded vpon the Condition of all Salvages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgement: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vying their aduantage, or taking reuenge of injuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, vse commonly this answer, it hath still bene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Diuers overthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their own Countrie they did little harme:

not sending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make warre, saue on their owne ground.

The Countrie of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italie that became subiect vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and thoroughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Oxe-hide: and the Romans found in it the propertie of that Oxe-hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldome did it happen, that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardie Nation, and easily stirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselves: and being diuided into many small Signories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer provided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such private respects made them often to fall asunder; when many had vnted themselves together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often overthrowes: as desire of libertie, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had bene accustomed, to make euacuation of this Chollerick Spanish humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to bee vniuersal at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrie, and vsed them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which they raysed vpon the whole Countrie; as being farre better husbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwise the Romans, vying the seruice of their owne Legions, and of their sure friends the Latines, had little businesse for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much businesse with them. Spain was too farre distant, and withall too great, for them to send ouer Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the course that they tooke in Italie. Wherefore it remained, that they should alwayes maintaine such Armies in the Countrie, as might serue to hold it in obedience perforce; and such heedfull Captaines, as might bee still ready to oppose the Barbarians in their first Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrie, though seldome in peace.

Very soone after the departure of Scipio, there was raised warre in Spain against the Romans, euen vpon the same general ground, that was the foundation of all the Spanish warres following. It was thought vnreasonable, that the Spaniards should one while helpe the Carthaginians against the Romans, and another while the Romans against the Carthaginians; basely forgetting to helpe themselves against those that were strangers, yet vsurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of warre in those parts, suppressed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with subiection, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which lasted five yeeres. This Victorie of the Romans, though it happily ended the warre: yet left it still remaining the cause of the warre; which after five yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconsul, whom they slew; and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happie successe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to send thither two Pretors, and with each of them some two Legions. These did somewhat: yet not so much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Consul the yeere following, and sent into that Province; found at his coming little lesse to doe, than the reconquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: some were faithfull to Rome; and some were idle beholders of the paines that that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great Victorie vpon the chief of them; they rose against him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him to much new trouble. While hee was about to make a iourne against those that were as yet vnsubdued: some of the lately vanquished, were euen readie to rebell. Hee therefore disarmed them: which they tooke so heauily, that many of them slew themselves for very grieke. Hearing of this, and well vnderstanding, that such desperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietnesse, which they neuer had disturbed but vnto their owne great losse. Hee praied them to deuise what course might be taken, for holding them assured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counsaile in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their inuention barren in this kind of Subiect; He gaue expresse charge, That vpon a day appointed they should throw downe the wals of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with singular industrie finished it in short time. Neither thought he it any disgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Armie of the Celiberians, against other of their Countrymen: exalting the indignitie, such as it seemed, with a iest, That if he were vanquished and slaine, then should he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victorie, hee could pay them with the Enemies monie. Finally Hee brought the Warre to so good end, 20 that in long time after, though Spain were often troublesome, yet was it in no danger of being lost. He increased also the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by causing some Mines of Iron and Siluer to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar disposition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of War, which might well be then termed The Occupation of the Romans; but so well furnished with all other vlesful qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might seeme requisite to the accomplishment of a perfect man. Hee was very skilful in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, and not vnprofitable in any businesse either private or 30 publike. Many Bookes he wrote: whereof the principal were, of the Roman antiquities, and of husbandrie. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie hee was, and exceeding temperate: so as he liued in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better sort of the Romans, was his great sinceritie of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein hee had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthe men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. 40 Otherwise, Hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that hee could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he neuer were out of his Element. Hee lused businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that euen vnto the end of his life, Hee was exercised in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore and sixe yeeres, He pleaded in his own defence: and foure yeeres after, he accused Sergius Galba vnto the People. So beganne the Nobilitie of Cato his family; which ended in his great grandchild M. Cato the Pitican: one, that being of like vertue and seruencie had all his good purposes dashed, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and grauenesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish Warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrey, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrey seldom free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two euery yeere were sent ouer Commanders into Spain (that was diuided into two

two euery yeere were sent ouer Commanders into Spain (that was diuided into two Governments) did rarely faile of such worke, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One slew thirteene thousand Spaniards in a battaile: another tooke fittie Townes, and a third enforced many States of the Countrey to sue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable seruice; yet so, that commonly there were of men, towne, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof I haue already pointed; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the businesse in Spain required not the employment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, vntil the 10 Numantian Warre brake out; which was verie long after.

In all other Countreies to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselves and their obedient Citie: Masaniissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the lesser Syria: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrey the Numidian challenged, and by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any Warre, 20 without leave obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way offered, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Iudges had been vnpartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out vnto them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrey: Masaniissa himselfe, now very lately, pursuing a Rebelle that fled out of his Kingdome, desired leave of the Carthaginians, for him'selfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise beene questionable) that the Countrey was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masaniissa had wherewith to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Roman Senate. Hee gaue the Fathers to vnderstand by his Embassadors, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and 30 how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent vnto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined vpon some suspicion of his errand; yet neither arressting him nor his ship, had thereby afforded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainly it was their purpose to rebell: and therefore good policie to keepe them downe. As for the Countrey of Emporia: it had alwayes, he said, bene theirs, that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometimes vnto the Numidian Kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had no very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citie stood; or scarcely to so much.

40 For they were no better than strangers in Africa, that had gotten leave there to build vpon so much ground, as they could encompass with an Ox-hide cut into small thongs. Whatsoeuer they held without such a compasse, was purchased by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This considered, Masaniissa requested of the Senate, That they would not adiudge vnto such vsurers, the Countrey sometimes pertaining to the Ancestors of him their assured friend. The Romans hauing heard these allegations on both sides, found the matter so doubtfull, that they could not on the suddentell what to determine. Wherefore because they would doe nothing rashly; they sent ouer three Embassadours, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuersie: yet secretly giuing them

50 instructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embassadours followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Masaniissa with a strong Armie should quickly preuaile, against those that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime against the wrong. By such Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from sitting in fauour of King

Antiochus,

Antiochus, if they had thereto any disposition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their final destruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leisure to expresse the vtmost of their hatred.

¶ VI.

The Aetolians labour to provoke ANTIOCHVS, PHILIP, and NABIS, to warre vpon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. NABIS besiegeth Gytheum, and wasteth some part of Achaia. The exact skill of PHILOPÆOMEN, in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquisheth NABIS. ANTIOCHVS being denied Peace by the Romans, ioynes with the Aetolians. The Aetolians surprize DEMETRIAS, and by killing NABIS, their Confederates seize vpon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who as PHILOPÆOMEN his persuasions annex themselves to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Aetolians to thinke, that they who had promised vnto themselves the whole spoile of Philip, and the highest reputation among the Greekes; were not only disappointed of their courteous hopes, but quite forsaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the most vnregarded. Yet was there made a great access to their Estate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had bene taken from the Macedonians. This might haue well sufficed them, if their desires had not bene immoderate; and their indignation, more vehement, than their desire. But they were not so pleased with that which they had, since they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themselves to be wholly disesteemed, wherein they thought that they had vn-sufferable wrong. Wherefore they desired, in a Parliament which they shortly held, by what meanes they best might right themselves; and giue the Romans a sorrowfull knowledge of the difference, betwene their enmitie and friendship. To this purpose they soone agreed, as concurring all in one affection, That they would not onely perswade Antiochus to make warre vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refused Peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient Enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to ioyne all together in a new Confederacie: whose ioynt forces could not in all likelihood but farre surmount those of the Romans, Achæans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterprise, which the Aetolians tooke in hand; and well becoming them, for they were great darers. They sent Embassadors to all these Kings, with persuasions as they thought most forcible. But Philip was irrelolute; and Antiochus willing to trie first all other courses. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had lost much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet shewed himselfe of all other the most forward: and not staying so much as to seeke any good pretence, beganne immediately to lay siege to Gytheum, that had bene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whose care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponnesus, were not slow to admonish Nabis of his dutie: neither would they haue faied long from repreffing his violence by open warre; had not some of them thought it wisdome to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselves in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent the time in sending Embassadors, and were aduised by Quintius to let all alone, and to waite for the coming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iuster cause of complaint, by waisting their owne Territorie.

Philopæmen was then Prætor of the Achæans, who had long been absent in Crete; making making war there for his mindes sake and recreation. Vnto him the Achæans referred themselves, giuing him leave to order the warre at his pleasure; either flying vntill the Romans came; or doing other wise, as hee should thinke best. He made all haste to relieue Gytheum, by Sea; fearing lest the Towne, and the Achæan Garrison within it, should bee lost, if hee vied any delay. But Philopæmen was so bad a Seaman, that he knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrieme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeeres agoe been counted a gallant vessel, in the Naue of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was theret of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leakes, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleet saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and faued themselves with what speede they could. But Philopæmen was not bereft with danted. If hee had failed in Sea-service, which was none of his Occupation, Hee said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gytheum, to stop the Achæans if they should inuade his Countie. But vpon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopæmen came unexpected; fired their Campe; and put all, save a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched he with all his Armie towards Lacedæmon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him that had already taken Gytheum. It was not expected that Nabis would haue been ready for them so soone. Or if hee should come from Gytheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee must ouertake them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some fife miles; hauing their Horse, & the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vnderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custome of Philopæmen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to marke the situation of the Countie about him; and to discourse, what might befall an Armie marching the same way. Hee would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of Souldiours, ordered and sorted in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were vpon that ground encountered by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would he put the question, whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand; what piece of ground it were meete for him to seize vpon; and in what manner he might best doe it; in what sort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Gard? in what sort encampe himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continuall meditation Hee was growne so perfect, that he neuer mette with any difficultie, whence he could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Rere, Hee encamped neare vnto the place where he was; within halfe a mile of the Enemy. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiours. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke; whereto the Achæans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopæmen vnderstood this; and layd an ambush in place conuenient; wherinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, he caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitive, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purpose to get betwene him and Lacedæmon; wherby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people, to take armes for the recovery of their freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would have been forced. Some Companies hee made to stay behinde, and shew themselves vpon the Rampart, thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopamen was not to be beguiled. He easily won the Campe and gaue chase to Nabis; whose followers being overtaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus dispersed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in covert all that day; Philopamen conceived aright, that their feare and necessitie would teach them to crepe homewards, and saue themselves, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Evening, when he had gathered together all those of his Light-armature, which had followed the chase whilst it was day, Hee led forth the rest that had well refreshed themselves, and occupied the two moit ordinarie passages vnto Lacedaemon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiving in Philopamen Campe great store of lights; thought that all had been at rest: and therefore aduentured to make an escape home. But they were so way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirtie dayes together after this, did Philopamen waste the Countrey round about, whilst Nabis durst not issue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embassadours were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them; labouring to make their partie strong against Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew 20 to be solicited by the Ætoliens. Verie faire countenance they also made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promises drew him to make shew, whatsoeuer he thought, of good correspondence. They promised to restore vnto him his sonne: and were contented to let him hope, that hee should receive other fauours at their hands; and regaine possession of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre against Antiochus in Greece, whilst their Embassadours that were with him in Asia, denied otherwise to grant him Peace, than if he would yeeld vnto one of the Conditions, by them so often propounded. The long absence of this King in Syria, where he had accomplished the marriage betweene Ptoleme and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the Kings sonne, 30 which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or seemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in person to the Embassadours; caused them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their answer as at their setting forth. One thing that might haue bene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to passe during their abode at Ephesus; either by cunning, or (as Livius rather thinks) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they discoursed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a causelesse suspition whercin hee held the Romans: that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of these Embassadours; and that hee, among other discourses with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had liued, 40 Nabis iudged the most worthy? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the first place: to Pyrrhus the second: and the third hee challenged vnto himselfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldst thou haue said then, Hannibal, if thou hadst vanquished mee? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the first place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my selfe. Now whether this were so, or otherwise: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embassadours, made him suspected of Antiochus: who therefore did forbear awhile to vse his counsell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King: and plainely desiring him to tell the cause thereof, heard what it was; He easily recovered his former grace, and credit. For he told how his Father had caused him to sweare at the Alcers, when hee was a little boy, That hee neuer should be friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vaine fur-

mises: but to know thus much, That as long as he thought vpon warre with Rome, so long would Hannibal doe him all good seruice: whereas contrariwise if he intended to make peace, then should it behooue him to vse the counsaile of some other man.

The Ætoliens, and their friends, were no lesse busied all this while, in making their partie strong against the Romans, than were the Romans, in multering vp their friends in Greece. They had so often dealt with Antiochus, vnting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the victorie against Philip; that finally they preuailed with him: especially when the Roman Embassadours left him without hope of peace, vnlesse hee would buy it at too deare a rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian. But in vaine. Hee vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their owne forces to the vtmost: as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselves, without helpe from any; saue onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilst they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embassadours, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the buisnes worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would bee no small peece of seruice, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore hee came to their Panathenium, or great Assemblie of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serue to appease them. Hee willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they tooke in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Countrey, the Romans, and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Maistrie: the Ætoliens, as Masters in that kinde of Fence, setting them on, and becoming *the Sticklers. 30 for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe to send Embassadours to Rome, that should either plead their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired: than thus to set the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he sayd, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to beare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen 40 to obtaine what they desired; either as their right, or else by way of fauour. For with such termes had they beene sealed once already: and were by the Senate reiecte vnto Titus: who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be entreated to come ouer into Greece, as well to set the Countrey at libertie, as also to decide the controuersies depending betweene the Romans and Ætoliens. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the Kings minde before. Hauing made it, they forgot no point of brauerie, vvhether by to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadours, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prator, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prator answered, That then hee had other things to do: but that this Decree, & their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if he came to their camp in Italy vpon the river of Tiberis. Gentler words would haue done better, as the Ætoliens are like to vnderstand hereafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more priuate Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authoritie of a generall Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councell of Ætolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongest heads could haue done. They layd a plotte, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden; entering, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie; who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had been driuen to flee thence, but was, by intercession of those that loued him, againe recalled. His Ætolian companions, that were not many, seized vpon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not far behind them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered; and the Towne prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but only to deliuer the Towne from the Romans; who more insolently domiered ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetorick they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plain force. For the Towne-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garrison to keepe them from the Romans; from whom they neither feared any danger, nor receiued iniurie. So this busines was dashed. The attempt vpon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne; styling himselfe King: but, more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had wel-neare lost all, by means of the ouerthrow which Philopamen had lately given him: since, he durst not stirre abroad; and dayly expected the mischiefe, that on all sides threatned him. Wherefore he sent messengers, one after another, to the Ætoliens; requesting them, That as He had not been slow to stirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himselfe vpon the vtmost of danger, when all others were backward; so They would be pleased to send him what helpe they might, since his bad fortune had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often sayd, That the raucous Ætoliens were onely true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship otherwise than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercinarie forces, which vpheld his Tyrannie, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and, by so doing, to assure Lacedamon vnto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a worke. To him they gaue a thousand Foot, and thirtie Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirtie were by Damocritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should bee, nor to thinke that they were sent to make warre with the Acheans, or to doe ought else, save onely what Alexamenus should command them; which, were it neuer so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they vnderstand, that vnlesse they performed it, they should haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this great King, without other helpe, would suffice to tread them downe. As for the Ætoliens, Hee said, that if need should so require, they would presently find away to Lacedamon all the forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore

with no greater companie. Hercupon he willed Nabis to take heart, bring forth his men, that had been long pent vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals; as if shortly he should employ them in worke of conquest, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field; riding vp and downe with his Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion to step aside alone to his Ætoliens, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned againe to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great worke that he had in hand: Hee then went aside to his thirtie Horsemen, and bade them remember the taske enioyned them at their setting forth; telling them that they were all in case of banished men, vnlesse they would anon come vp to him, and helpe him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and struck him downe. The thirtie Ætoliens neuer stood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercinaries ranne vnto the dead bodie: where in stead of seeking reuenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætoliens hasted into the Citie, and seized on the Palace; where hee fell to ransacking the Treasurie; and troubled himselfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were dispersed in the Towne, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Towne was shortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall stocke, that had beene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a Good Horse, and made him their chiefe. So they fell vpon the Ætoliens that were idly stragling about; and put them all to the sword. Alexamenus with not many of his Companie, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who solde them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedamon, Philopamen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such wordes vnto them, as Alexamenus should haue done after hee had slaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safetie, to incorporate themselves with the Acheans. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætoliens, and the small, but effectual, traualle of Philopamen; the Acheans made a notable purchase: and Lacedamon, that had hitherto bin gouerned eyther by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the member of a Common-wealth; wherof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

b. VII.

ANTIOCHVS, perswaded by THOAS the Aetolian, comes over into Greece, ill attended. Sundrie passages betwene him, the Aetolians, Chalcidians and others. Hee winnes Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Euboea. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Aetolians, with the Civill answer of TITVS to their discourse, before the Achaens. That it concerned the Greekes to have desired peace, betwene the Romans and ANTIOCHVS, as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petite Estates that fell to the King. Of AMINANDER, and an idle vanitie, by which 10 King PHILIP was lost. HANNIBAL gives good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; Where hee marrieth a young Wife, and sends away the rest of Winter. Upon the comming of the Roman Consul all forsake ANTIOCHVS. Hee with two thousand Aetolians keeps the Straights of Thermopylae. Hee is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece vnto the Victors.

ANTIOCHVS was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him; and to 20 winne them by force, was more than hitherto hee was able. Yet was hee desirous with all speed convenient to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was already vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bando in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Aetolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were ready to conferre vpon him the greatest, which they had unworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise, as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King 30 was thinking to send Hannibal into Africke, there to molest the Romans, and so giue him the better leisure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Aetolian came ouer to him, and bade him lay all other care aside; for that his Countreymen had already taken Demetrius; a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence hee might proceed as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without need of vsing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vnfit 40 man to be employed in the Kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the King should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing vnder such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal preuailed, Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard hee was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should bee alwayes nere vnto the Kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soueraigne Command; euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkned vnto this admonition; being icalous of the vertue, that shined 50 brighter than the Maistie of his owne fortune. And therupon hee laid aside the determination; which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a friuolous

lous pomp of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to linus; there to do sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Aegean Sea, Hee came to Demetrius. Euryteles the Magnesian, the same whome the Aetolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they wanne Demetrius; was now the chiefe man and Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countreymen, in great frequency, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a signe of good lucke, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnesian found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie more fortie were seruiciable for the Warres; with an Armie of tenne thousand Foot, five hundred Horse, and fixe Elephants. The Aetolians no sooner heard of his comming, than they called a Parliament; and made a Decree, whereby they invited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lemna, the Aetolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein hee desired them to hold him excused, that hee came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he said, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that hee said not to 10 make all things ready; but halted vnto their aid, euen whilest the season was vnfit for navigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those that had expected him, would be satisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neyther would hee spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which hee had undertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leaving the Countrie free indeed, and the Aetolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all prouisions to them belonging should be correpndent; because hee would not be any way burdensome vnto his Confederates. But at the present hee must needs entreat them, ha- 30 uing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprovided of many necessaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he stood in need. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences betwene the Romans and them, should be pur by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yeeld vnto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus, in a businesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is meere popular. For if the vchecemie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not preuailed in this Councell: the Aetolians, for gaine of two 40 or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might haue deceived them, were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedie had there bene, if this had so fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himselfe to Thoas, and complained of the wrong; but hee must haue been contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side, whom Thoas would therefore haue pronounced to bee very wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirte Commissioners were appointed to bee about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute 50 where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whether if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure need to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Aetolia but a thousand Foot; leaving the rest behind him at Demetrius. With these hee hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Ætolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsfull, they said would neuer be obtained; vntill by remouing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euery seuerall Estate had where to find redresse of any pssure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuertheless desired them onely, so to joyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans or Hee should offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to seeke redresse at the other hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but absolute; for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whose good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they spake of themselves, they could likewise affirme of all the Greekes: forasmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept vnder, by any Garrison; or liued otherwise than by their owne Lanes, and without being tied vnto condition which displeased them. Wherefore they wondered, why the King should thus trouble himselfe, to deliuer Cities that were already free. But since hee, and the Ætolians, requested their friendship: they besought both him, and the Ætolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in such good case as they were. With this answer the King departed: for he was not, as then, strong enough to force them. But very soone after, hee brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yield: before all the succours could arrive, which Titus had sent for their defence.

The chiefe Cite of Eubœa being thus gorten; all the rest of the Iland shortly yielded to Antiochus. Foure or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer late so haue defended Chalcis, reposed themselves at Delium, a little Towne of Boeotia, lying ouer against the Iland; where was a Temple and Groue, consecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priuiledge of an inuolable Sanctuary. In this place were some of them walking, and beholding the things there to be seene, whilst others were busied as they found cause: without feare of any danger; as being in such a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captaines, that had wearied himselfe in many vaine Treaties of peace; tooke aduantage of their carelesnesse, and vsed them with all extremite of werr. Very few of them escaped: fiftie were taken; and the rest slaine. Hereat Quintus was grieved: yet so, as it pleased him well to consider, that his Romans had now more iust cause than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked well these beginnings, and sent Embassadors into all quarters of Greece, in hope, that his reputation should perswade very many to take his part. The wiser sort returned such answer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some referred themselves vntill hee should come among them: knowing that eyther, if hee came not, Hee must holde them excused for not daring to stirre; or, if hee came, the Romans must pardon their iust feare, in yielding to the stronger. None of those that lay farre off, joynd with him in true meaning; save the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achaens. Little reason there was, that hee should thinke to draw the Achaens to his partie. Neuertheless hee assayed them, vpon a vaine hope that the enuie, which Titus was said to beare vnto Philopemenus verue, had bred a secret dislike betweene that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Ætolians sent Embassadors to the Councell at Argum; that spured not braue wordes, if the Achaens would haue to beene taken. The Kings Embassadors told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming: reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimæans and Cadusians; names that were not euery day heard of, and therefore as hee thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydenians, Tyrrians, Aradians, and Pamphylians were; such indeed as could not be resisted. Now concerning monie and all warlike furniture: it was, he said, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Asia had alwayes thercof great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who considering the late warre made against Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the like: the case was too faire different. Yet this most powerful King, that for the libertie of Greece was come from the vtmost parts of the East; requested no more of the Achaens, than that they would hold themselves as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whilst Hee tooke order with the Romans. To the same effect spake the Ætolian Embassadors: and further added, That in the battell at Cynosephale, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both Hee and his Armie had bene there destroyed, had they not bene protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was present at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit answer, as could haue bene desired. He told the Achaens, That neither the Kings Embassadors, nor the Ætolian, did so greatly labour to perswade those vnto whom they addressed their Orations; as to vnto themselves the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discern, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus lincked the King and the Ætolians together. For euery such bragges as heretofore made, before the Achaens who knew them to beliers, had the Ætolians also made vnto King Antiochus: proclaiming the victorie ouer Philip to be merely their Act: and the whole Countrie of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they bene sealed by the King, with such tales as his Embassadors told euery now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimæans, and many others: that were all but a companie of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaves, and good for little else. These diuers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diuersitie of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis (no such vanter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that varietie, whercoat hee wondered, was none other, as his Host then merrily tolde him; than so many pieces of one same swine, dressed after seuerall fashions with varietie of sawces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make iudgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Armie he was laine in a manner, to begge vittualles of the Ætolians; and take vp monie at vsurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ran vp and downe the Countrie: from Demetrias to Lamia; thence backe to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lies: wherewith since both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other: meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men tooke heed by their example. To a fauourable Auditorie much perswasion is needlesse.

The Achaens did not loue so well the Ætolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abjects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed war against him, and against the Ætolians.

How the hatred betweene these two Nations grew inueterate: sufficiently appears in the storie foregoing. Now haue they gorten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, King Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwisely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid, on the turbulent spirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrie at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue bene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue sought, not how Smyrna and Lampsacus might recover their libertie (which had neuer bene held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countrie, as two

Seas

Seas by an Isthmus or necke of land, might be kept from overflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those bafe Asiatiques, which originally were Greekish; than the generall applause, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachus, and the Townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should moue them to take armes euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assit the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not only this quarrell bene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Countrey, had been far from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achaens were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gaue doubtfull answeres of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firme against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrell, nor shewed themselves his enemies, till hee pressed them with open force. The Boeotians willingly receiued him, as soone as hee entered vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans; by whom they had bene somewhat hardly vsed. Aminander the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait; which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arceadian, that was an idle-headed man, and wanted himselfe to be defended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sifter to the poore Court of Athamania: where hauing made his follie knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; He was iudged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memorie of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behoued him to draw Aminander to their partie, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by persuasions of himselfe, or of his sifter, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of seruice done by this imaginarie King (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians that should be his subiects; or whether from some vanitie in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynosephala, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselves to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip tooke it in high indignation; as intended merely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently lent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that hee was readie with all his power to aid them wherein soeuer they should be pleased to vse him.

The Ætolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Boeotians, and Athamanians, hauing now all ioynd with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his persuasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring; because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, 50 and some another: confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge; as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long bene cast aside, as a vessell of no vse; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he should now vtter, ter, was euen the same which hee would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before been asked since their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Boeotians, and other their good friends, which now lo willingly tooke their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselves for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as readie to fall to the contrary side, all adging the same feare for their excuse? wherefore hee thought most behouefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie: who (belides that being once engaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince, and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily persuaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very strong Argument: though indeed what neede was there, of proouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said hee, These Ætolians here present; and namely, Thimoas, being lately Embassador from them into Asia, among other Motiues which hee then vsed to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainly on the same point. He told vs that Philip was moued beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likening that King to some wild beest, that was chained or lockt up within some grate, and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, 20 that hee may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry stomacke, vpon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it proue otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoue vs to looke vnto him, that hee may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage, let Seleucus be in readines, to fall vpon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip and the present War in Greece. But more generally for the manning of this great enterprize, wherein you are now embarked against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: Whereto had you then giuen care, the Romans by this time should haue heard other newes, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italy and Gaul should haue bene on fire with warre: and, little to their comfort, they should haue vnder stood, that Hannibal was againe come into Italy. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Armie hither (but in any case let Shippes of burden come along with them, laden with store of vittuals: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouths.) Whereof let the one halfe be employed against Italy; whilst you in person with the other halfe, carrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen readie to follow vs into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice: who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of warre: yet how to warre with 40 the Romans, I haue bene instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine oyne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent seruice for the execution: but what counsaile soeuer you shall please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said hee had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; saue onely that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessalie, about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King that lay before the wals with his whole Armie. Tis their faith 50 and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For Mabius, a Roman Proprietor did send helpe thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemy vnto Antiochus: where by the fame of the succour comming to Larissa grew such, as wrought more than the succour could haue done, had it arriued. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountaines toppes afarre off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had beene coming vpon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yere; Hee brake vp his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a yong Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne: whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betwene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiours as readily imitated their Captaines: in such wise that when heooke the field, he might evidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Atilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, 10 and helpe him to reclaime them from this loosefelle of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Atilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The warre against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise He was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of farre lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobilitie of his Familie, had beene long sice, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and superstition, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the verie best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught 20 them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Province; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should afford him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Boians: wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of warre. But M. Atilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, and fiftene Elephants. Ptolemie King of Aegypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus: and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Em- 30 bassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Ptolemie sent also gold and siluer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But hee was too yong, and dwelt too farre off. So his monie was returned vnto him with thanks; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philip's Embassadors answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that Hee should giue to Atilius the Consul. Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strue, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they 40 would send partly to Rome, partly to the Armie in Greece. And herein Masanissa tarre out-went the poore Citie of Carthage: as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul fise hundred Horse, and twentie Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vnderooke to set out a Fleet at their owne charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-monie, which was behinde, and ought to bee discharged by many yeerly penfions. But the Romans did neither thinke it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne; it was accepted with Condition, That they should be contented to receiue the price of it.

The hastie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and pro- 50 parations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, betwene the Roman and the Asiatick souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same manner as hee had preuailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to

proue their excuse, when they should againe forsake him. But King Philip and Berius, hauing recovered many places; and the Roman Consul being arruied, against whom none made resistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Antiochus fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enioyed; as in recompence of his good seruice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Antiochus's wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking flocke: and sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians vsed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities, one after other, gaue vp themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne liues, 10 and departing vnarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them layed behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus: who hauing withdrawn himselfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toile during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, He found all the promises of the Ætolians meere verbal: and himselfe reduced into termes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yea a very Prophet, that had foreseene all this long before. Neuertheless He sent word to the Ætolians, that they should now make readie all their forces: as considering their owne need to bee no lesse than 20 his. But the Ætolians had caule to thinke, that they themselves were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus: who hauing promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought ouer. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioyned with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thas and his fellows had done their best, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: He seized vpon the Streights of Thermopylae: as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntill more helpe should 30 come. Of the Streights of Thermopylae there hath beene spoken enough before, *13. 6. 53. vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceiued, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece: vnlesse they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betwene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three dayes together, against a World of men coming to inuade the Countrey. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he listed himselfe in Greece: did commit himselfe vnto the falcitie of this place, 40 when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whilst he lay, Hee sent earnest messages one after other to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus: but at leastwise now to helpe, and keepe the tops of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path, should come downe vpon him. By this importunitie, he got of them two thousand, that vnderooke to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficultie, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the Streights: without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindered by sickenesse from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them beene Consuls. These he sent forth by night 50 with two thousand men, to trie whether by any means they could get vp to the Ætolians. He himselfe encouraged his Armie: not onely by telling them, with what base-conditioned enemies they had to deale: but what rich Kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a fore iourney (for what happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, save onely that hee failed in his intent; and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepe Rocks and crooked wayes: Hee commanded them to repose themselves; whilst Hee, being a verie able man of bodie, tooke in hand the discoverie, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward breake of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Straights below, that required no such trouble of climbing: neyther had this entrance of the Thermopylae bene so often the Seat of Warre, as might cause any traualers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light: by which he discovered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him; and some of the Ætolians verie nere vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a luttie Crue of his men, whom he thought fittest for that service, and willed them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and he thereby vnderstood, that these Ætolians were no more than fixe hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently let vpon the Ætolians; where-20 threw them; slue a great part of them; and chased the rest, that by flying to their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was alreadie begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Campe, found it in a manner a desperate piece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe; which occupied the whole bredth of the Straights; was notably fortified; and not onely defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of service; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed over them on the Hill-side, and powred downe a shower of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought at first, that the Ætolians had bene coming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and ensignes were discovered, such was the terror, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Roman Armie from making pursuit. Yet this dayes losse draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence, with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had embraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consul giue them any respite.
 40 At his returne from Chalcis He met with King Philip, that hauing recovered health, came to ioyne with him against Antiochus: over whom since the victorie was already gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who saime would haue taken Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vied to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen ready to be taken, when the Consul, hauing wonne Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoile of these Townes was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopylae.
 50 Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Antius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victorie, got not Lamia himselfe: vntill such time as another Consul was readie to ease him of his charge.

The

The losse of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto King Antiochus presently after his flight: entreating him not to forsake them vtterly, but eyther to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing withheld him from comming in person, at leastwise to helpe them with money and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour; but appertained vnto his owne safetie: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this; and found their words true.

10 Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicanor, one of their Embassadors, a summe of money, that might serue to defray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thoas, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him: who willingly staid, that he might vrge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them: then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suit vnto the Consul to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouch safe to giue them audience, but said Hee had other businesse in hand: onely He granted them tenne dayes of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as 20 much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alleadge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memorie of all such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore hee willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euen betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselves vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing vnto the faith; signified, in their vse of it, little else, than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted
 30 them all one, as yielding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: Hee asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then sayde Hee, I command you first of all, That none of yee presume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse priuate or publike: then, That yee deliuer vp vnto me Dicarchus the Ætolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Albanian, and such of his Countenmen as haue followed him in revolt from vs. Whilst hee was yet speaking: Phameas the Embassador interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the Custome of the Greekes, who 40 had yielded themselves vnto his faith; not vnto his avarice. What? (saide the Consul) Doe yee stand to pleade Custome with mee, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euerie one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadors; though since, their Condition was altered. Phameas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apocletor ordinarie Councel of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions; without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause Hee entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce
 50 for so long.

This surceance of warre, during tenne and other tenne dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had bene commaunded away from Lamia, that else he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that King, and to the end that hee might not returne home with his

Armic, like one that could not bee trusted in employment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further need of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other petite Nations their borderers, whilst the Consul was busie with the Ætoliens; taking for his reward, all that He could get. And Hee got in that space all Athamania, Perrhebia, Aperanta, and Dolopia. For the Ætoliens, hearing what had befallen their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill provided for Warre; yet they could not endure to heare more talke of peace. And it happened, that Nicanor about the same time was come backe from Antiochus, with money and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heracles; and Philip hauing lately risen 10 from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His monie Nicanor conueighed into Lamia, by verie vnusuall dexteritie. But hee himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Ætoliens, there to make report of his Embassage, was verie much perplexed about this his iourne, which lay betwene the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet hee made the aduenture: and keeping as farre as hee could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians; by whom hee was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but cyther to bee deliuered vnto the Romans, or vnto ill enough by Philip. But it seemed, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For Hee commanded his seruants to entreat Nicanor friendly: and hee himselfe being then 20 at supper, did visit him as soone as hee rose vp: giuing him to vnderstand; That the Ætoliens did now reape the fruits of their owne madnesse; forasmuch as they could neuer hold themselves contented, but wold needs bee calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselves well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus; but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, He said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any trial: for surely their good affection, one vnto the other, would bee much more auailable vnto each of them; than their mutuall catching of aduantages; whereby they had wrought themselves much displeasure. Thus much the King willed Nicanor to signifie vnto 30 his Countreymen; and privately to hold in minde the courtesie which hee then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata; Hee lovingly dismissed him. For this benefit, Nicanor was alwayes after dutifully affected to the Crowne of Macedon: so as in the warre of Perseus hee made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Ætoliens refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: hee forthwith meant to prosecute the warre-against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whether hee therefore directly marched, to trie what 40 they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceiued it: for it was a strong Citie, and well manned. But Achilles stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that hee should haue bene a loser, by rising from before it without Victorie. So Hee staid there welneere all the following time of his Consulship; whilst the Macedonian King and the Acheans made farre better vse of the Roman Victorie. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, wan the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastie course of Victorie, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Acheans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long bene addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good wordes; whereby they saved themselves from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded; had none other helpe when the Achean Prætor wasted their Countrie, than to offer themselves vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth; to whom they sent word, word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Acheans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achean Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the per-emptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annex themselves vnto the Acheans, and become part of their Common-wealth. Such was now the Majestie of a Roman Embassador. Titus did fauour the Acheans; yet could not like it well, that cyther they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against the Romans vpon euen termes; it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the lie of Zacynthus which had once bene Philips, and was afterward given by him to Aminander who sent a Gouernour thither. But when Aminander in this present Warre, was driuen out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Island to the Acheans; whom hee found readie Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootlesse to dispute. Wherefore the Acheans referred themselves vnto his discretion. So he told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tor-

toile, whereof Peloponnesus was the shell: and that holding themselves within that compasse, they were out of danger; but if they would needs bee looking abroad, they should lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Hauing settled things thus in Peloponnesus, Hee went out to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Consul had laine two moneths, that might haue bene laine better spent. There, whether out of compassion which Hee had vpon the Ætoliens, or out of dislike of King Philip thriving so fast: Hee perswaded the Consul to grant vnto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long Truce, that they might send Embassadours to Rome; and sub-30 mitting themselves, crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Ætoliens haue made such earnest suit as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had bene sure to carrie it, in any short space: it may well bee thought hee would not haue gone away without it; since the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole floure of the Nation, would haue made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came to Rome, no entreatie could helpe them to better Conditions, than one of these two; That either they should wholly permit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans should giue approbation. They had not so much monie: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they should giue themselves away vnto discretion; which what it signified, they now vnder-stood. Wherefore they desired to haue it set downe, in what points, and how farre forth, they should yeeld vnto the good pleasure of the Senate. But heereof they could get no certaine answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whilst the Ætoliens were pursuing their hopes of peace, the Consul had little to doe in Greece; and therefore tooke vpon him grauely to setting in order among the tractable Acheans. Hee would haue had them to restore the banished Lacedæmonians home into their Countrie; and to take the Eleans into the fellowshipe of their Common-wealth. This the Acheans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans should bee meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the restitution of the banished Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their owne mere grace. As for the Eleans; they were loth to bee beholding to the Romans, and thereby to disparage the Acheans into whose Corporation they were desirous to bee admitted; and saw that they should haue their desire, without such compulsiue mediation.

The

The Roman Admirall C. Linus, much about the same time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenus, Admirall to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twentie saile of Rhodiens came after the battaile, when they were following the Chace. The Kings Fleet was the better of saile: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenus being vanquished in fight, was yet out of danger; as loone as hee betooke himselfe to a speedie retreat.

And such end had the first yeeres warre, betwene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greekes as had followed the vaine hopes of the Ætolians, were glad to excuse themselves by feare; thinking themselves happie when by Embassadors they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie side, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now send to congratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had restored vnto him Demetrius his younger sonne; whom some few yeeres they had kept as an hostage. Also King Ptolemie of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victorie, sent word how greatly all Asia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard hee desired the Senate not to foregoe time; but to send an Armie, as loone as might be, into Asia: promising, that his assistance, wherein soeuer it pleased them to vse it, should not bee wanting. This Ptolemie was the sonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but hee was the friend of Fortune. Hee vnderstood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The same did Antiochus now beginne to suspect, who had thought himselfe awhile as safe at Ephesus, as if hee had beene in another World: but was told by Hannibal, that it was not so farre out of Greece into Asia, as out of Italy into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would soone be there, and make him trie the chance of a battaile for his Kingdome.

§. VIII.

LVCIVS SCIPIO, having with him PVLIVS the African his elder Brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea; and diuers fights. An invasion vpon Eumenes his Kingdome; with the siege of Pergamus, raised by an handfull of the Acheans. L. SCIPIO the Consul comes into Asia: where ANTIQCHVS most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battaile of MAGNESA: wherein ANTIQCHVS being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their Victorie. L. CORNELIVS SCIPIO, after a most sumptuous triumph ouer ANTIQCHVS, is surnamed The Asiatique, as his brother was stiled The African.

LVCIUS CORNELIVS SCIPIO, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lælius. Lælius was verie gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment; offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate; if L. Cornelius would be so pleased, the disposition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazard of a Lotterie. Lælius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time beene put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous, to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent: P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that warre, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controuersie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied relyed vpon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had beene victorious against the same Great Worthie? But indeed a worser man might haue frused well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trutt of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation; where his wilddome was much approued, but his libertie and high spirit as much disliked. Itis worthe of remembrance; as a signe of the freedome that he vied in his censures, euen whilst he liued in such a Court. Antiochus mulctred his Armeie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may seeme, to haue made him with, that hee had beene ferued by such braue men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horse, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of Gold, Silver, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauerie on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the King, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most couetous men in all the World: meaning, that all this Coll vpon the backs of Cowardly Asiatiques, was no better than a spoile to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King; it is easie to ghesse. The little vse that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the vse of his seruice, when he stood in greatest neede of it thereof.

The Scipio's made all haile away from Rome as soone as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the warre, about five thousand Voluntaries, that had serued vnder P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirtie Quinquereme Gallies, and twentie Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Æmilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that Voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphissa a Citie of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heerdlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left vngarded the last yeere. Glabrio knowing this, decciued their expectation, and fell vpon Lamis: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went hee to Amphissa: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foot and five hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armeie. The Towne of Amphissa was presently forsaken by the inhabitants, but they had a Castle, or higher Towne, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Ætolians: entreating him to stand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining some tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words: and willed them to perswade the Ætolians; that they should faithfully and with true meaning desire it. This was gladly taken. But many messages passing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Consul made still the same answer, with which they had beene chased from Rome. The conclusion was, That they should sue for a longer time of respite from warre: whereby at more leisure they might attend some better disposition of the Senate; or any helpfull commoditie which time should afford. So they obtained halfe a yeeres Truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another halfe yeeres leisure of breathing. Hereof were not they more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time lost, which with-held the Warre from passing ouer into Asia.

The businesse of Ætolia being thus laide aside: and the olde Consul Glabrio sent home into Italy: the Scipio's marched into Theffalie; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Alacedon and Thrace vnto the Hellepont. Yet they considered, That hereby they must commit themselves vnto the loyalte of King Philip: who might either doe them some mischief by the way, if hee were disposed to watch a notable advantage: or at the least, would be vnfaithfull, though he were not so courageous;

couragious; yet might he take such order with the Thracians, that euen for want of victualles, it by no greater inconvenience, they should be disgracefully forced to returne. He had promised them the vtmost of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant sincerely, they thought to make some triall; by causing a Gentleman to ride Post vnto him, and obserue his doings as hee should take him on the sudden. The King was merrie at a feast, and drinking, when the Messenger came: whom he louingly bade welcome; and shewed him the next day, not only what prouision of victualles he had made for the Armie, but how he had made bridges ouer the ri- uers, and mended the bad wayes by which they were to passe. With these good newes Gracchus returned backe in haste vnto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon,¹⁰ found all things in a readines, that might helpe to aduance their iourney. The King enterdayned them royally; and brought them on their way, euen to the Hellepont: where they stayed a good while, vntill their Nauie was in readinesse to transport them into Asia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the most part, little of importance. Polyxenus, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a banished Rho- dian: true to the King; and desirous of reuenge vpon his Countrey men that had ex- pelled him. Hee, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eu- menes hauing not as yet put to Sea; thought to doe somewhat vpon those that were so early in their diligence, before their followes should arrive to helpe them. Yet²⁰ went he craftily to worke; and lent word, as in great secrecie, to the Rhodian Ad- mirall, That if the sentence of his banishment might be repealed, He would, in re- quitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many passages to and fro, this was beleeued: and the Rhodian Admirall grew so carelesse, expecting still when he should receiue a watch word from Polyxenus, that he himselfe was taken by Polyxenus in his owne Haven. The Kings Fleet setting forth from Ephesus by night; and, for feare of being discouered, resting one day in harbour by the way; came the second night to Samos: where, by morning, it was readie to enter the Haven. Pausistratus the Rhodian Admirall seeing this, thought it his best way of resistance, to bestow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Haven; so to gard the mouth of it:³⁰ for that he saw no likelihood of defending himselfe by Sea. But Polyxenus had al- ready landed some companies, in another part of the Iland: which falling vpon the backe of Pausistratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboard. This could not be without great confusion: so as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and funke or boarded all his Nauie, five excepted, that by a sudden deuice made shift to escape. Each of them hung out a burning Cresset vpon two poles; at the Beake-head: and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemy: who hauing not bethought himselfe what shift to make against such vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto these desperate Gal- lies, for feare lest they should burne, together with themselves, a part of the Kings⁴⁰ Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had some losse by tempest: whereof Polyxenus could not take such aduantage as hee had hoped; because, putting to Sea for that purpose, Hee was driuen backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to shew that they were not discouraged, set forth twentie other Gallies: the Romans also with King Eumenes repaired their Fleet; and all of them together, in great bra- uerie, presented battail to Polyxenus before the Haven of Ephesus. When hee durst not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as cy- ther they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were⁵⁰ hindred by stormes at Sea; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forsake them; and returne home to the defence of his owne Kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the grounds about Elea and

and Pergamus: and leaving his sonne Selenus to besiege the royall Citie of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Armie spoile the whole Countrey thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; hauing with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore hee had reason to stand in feare; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thou- sand Foot, and an hundred Horse of the Achaens: old souldiers all, and trayed vp vnder Philopamen; whose Scholler, in the Art of war, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walles of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemy; began to didd ine, that such men as they¹⁰ should hold him besieged. For Selenus his Armie which was encamped at the hill- foot, seeing that none durst fallie forth vpon them, grew so carelesse: as otherwise, than by spoyling all behind their backes, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus: and told him that hee would goe forth to visit them. Attalus had no liking to this aduerture; for he said, that the match was nothing equall. But the Achaen would needs haue his will: and issuing forth, encamped not farre from the Enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers, they wondered at first what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himselfe quiet, they made a iekt of his boldnesse; and laughed to see with what an handful of men he looked so stout-²⁰ ly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, Hee commanded all his men to follow him, euen as fast as they well might; and he himselfe, with the hundred Horse, brake out on the sudden vpon the Station that was next at hand. Verie few of the enemies had their Horles readie saddled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make resistance: so as Hee draue them all out of their Campe; and chased them as farre as he might safely ad- uenture, with great slaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Ci- tizens of Pergamus (who had covered the wals of the Towne, men and women, to behold this spectacle) were very ioyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these³⁰ Achaens. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to helpe the Achaens in doing what remained to bee done. The next day Selenus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than hee had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested awhile in his old Station. When they had staid many houres, looking who should begin: Selenus, in faire order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moued not whilest the Enemy was in sight: but as soone as the ground betweene them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all haste, & soone ouertaking them with his Horle, charged them in Rere; so as hee brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldnes of the Achaens, and the balenesse of his owne men, caused Selenus to quit the siege, little to his honour.

Such being the qualitie of these Asiaticques; Philopamen had cause to tell the Romans,⁴⁰ That hee enuied their victorie. For when Antiochus lay leafling at Chalcis after his marriage, and his souldiers betooke themselues to Riot, as it had beene in a time of great security: a good man of war might haue cut all their throates, euen as they were tripling in their victualing houles; which Philopamen said that he would haue done, had hee beene Generall of the Achaens, and not, as he then was, a priuate man.

Antiochus was full of busines; and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trauaile, brought almost nothing to passe. He had beene at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himselfe with a few of his Horle and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his sonne as before hath⁵⁰ bene shewed, and went to Elea: whether hee heard that Amilius the Roman Ad- mirall was come, to bring succour to Eumenes. There hee made an Ouerture of peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Amilius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul; this Treatie brake off. Then followed the Ouerthrow newly menti- oned;

oned; which caused Seleucus to give over the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, foure or fife Townes of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of fceuen and thirtie Saile, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admirall of the Syrians, did them in manner as great hurt as they could doe to Apollonius; and hauing the victorie taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not farre aduenture vpon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Praefaces vnto the war; the last and greatest was a victorie of the Romans by Sea, against Polyxenus as the Kings Admirall. The battle was fought by Myonnesus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenus had with him fourefcore and nine Gallies; and fife of them greater, than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those bragges, wherewith Antiochus wanted the last yeere, That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fiftie Gallies; the Rhodians, two and twentie: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light timbered and thin plankt, hauing all aduantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forget they to helpe themselves by the same deuice; with which, fife of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemie: who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being flemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoysted saile: and hauing a faire wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet fortie of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirtene were taken: all the rest burnt or funke. The Romans and their fellows lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Maisterie of the Sea.

The report of this misaduenture, may seeme to haue taken from Antiochus all vfe of reason. For as if no hope had bene remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe: Hee presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily haue been kept, euen till the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the besiegers (if the siege had bene continued obstinately) to termes of great extremities. He also gaue ouer the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought faue onely of defence, drew together all his Armie; and sent for helpe to his father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellefpont; but had yeelded vnto him all places there, belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was then also in readinesse, to transport him ouer into Asia: where Enmenes had taken such care before, that Hee landed quietly at his owne good case; euen as if the Countrey had bene his already. The first newes that hee heard of the Enemie, was by an Embassadour that came to sue for peace. This Embassadour declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaeyning peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that hee should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyna, Lampscus, and Lysimachia, had bene the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now alreadye giuen ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to strue with the Romans about Lampscus and Smyna: what reason was there, why they should neede to trouble him with warre? If it was their desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should be also set at libertie, or otherwise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia: so as the bounds, diuiding them from the King, might not be vncertaine; and it should bee quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the Charges, wherewith they had bene in this warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselves contented with these good offers, and not to bee too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune; Hee expected their their answer. These offers which to the Embassadour seemed so great, were iudged by the Romans to be verie little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since it began through his onely fault: and that He should not onely depart out of those few Townes, which hee held in Asia and Ionis; but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keepe himselfe on the other side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadour therefore law, that no better bargain could bee made, He dealt with P. Scipio in priuate; and to him he promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne; who (it is vncertaine by what mischance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor other wise to the restitution of his sonne, than vpon Condition, That it might bee with making such amends for the benefit, as became a priuate man. As for the publike businesse: Hee onely said thus much, That since Antiochus had alreadye forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said He, tell your King in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may haue peace.

The King was not any whit moued with this aduice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no lesse, than if hee had bene alreadye subdued: little reason there was that he should feare to come to battaile; where in hee could lose, as hee thought, no more, than by seeking to auoid it the most giue away. He had with him threecore and ten thousand Foot, and twelue thousand Horse; besides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or fythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet hee was nothing pleased, to heare that the Consul drew neere him apace, as one halting to fight. But howsoever hee was affected; Hee made so little shew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sicke at Elee, He sent thither vnto him his sonne without ranfome: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickness, and withall not desirous to retaine the yong Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his bounde to bee constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein hee dealt craftily. For since hee could haue none other ranfome of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courtesie before the battell, as would afterwards haue bene little worth; than to stay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his sonne: so as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue bene much auailable vnto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanitie, Hee did onely thus much vnto those that brought him this acceptable Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by aduising him not to fight, vntill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus resolved to follow his counsaile: and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the Riuier of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnesia by Sipylus: where encamping, He fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul; and fate downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the Kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greekes, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slue some; and were anon, with some losse driuen backe ouer the Riuier. Two dayes were quietly spent, whilst neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the aduenture: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, vntill they came within two miles and an halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There, as they were taking vp their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote: whom the ordinarie Corps du gard repelled. Four dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul ful tooke aduice what was to bee done. For either they must fight vpon whatsoeuer disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subiect vnto many difficulties: vniuersally they would flaine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more convenient place, and so deferre the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldier was thoroughly perswaded of that Enemies bale temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie, that this great Armie should bee assailed, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to bee fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans tooke the field againe, and ordered their Battailles: He also did the like; and aduanced so farre, that they might vnderstand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Armie consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were fiftie thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as vsually, were in the points; the Romans in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were diuided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them followed the Principes, at such distance as was vsuall; and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly 10 Achaeans; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vnto most of all (saue some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troups of horse were placed there, though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Consul had with him fixteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they onely would haue serued to discourage his men; as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more 30 courageous beasts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much aduantage in number.

The Kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuersly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the severall kindes, in such wise as each might be of most vse. The maine strength of his Foote consisted in fixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These hee placed in the midst; and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one having two and thirtie in File, and fiftie in Front. Betwene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backs, and besides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these 40 were fiftene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greekes: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Countrey, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horse, diuided in their severall kindes, doe seeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue been stretched out in Front. Adioyning to these, were fixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings owne Regiment; called the Argyraspides, or Silvershields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had serued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foote, two thousand and five hundred Archers of Mysia; with foure thousand slingers and Archers of the Carians, and Elymaeans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greekes, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand Horse 50 that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seuen hundred of diuers Nations,

Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called the Kings Troupe, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon late Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serue to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cilicians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrtians, Elymaeans, and many others, hauing all with them fixteene Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captaines commanded ouer the Phalangiers.

10 The first onset was giuen by the Dromedaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with showings, and noyses, and some wounds, they were driuen out of the field; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this aduantage, charged vpon the left wing: where they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with such variety of Auxiliaries, made little or 20 no resistance; but all of them fled, in manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the Kings Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaille: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flanked with Horse: gaue vpon them courageously, and forced them to retire. But M. Anullus, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discouered the approach; He not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further triarance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled 30 into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaille fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slaine about three hundred Foot, and foure and twentie Horse: of Eumenes his followers five and twentie.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apames, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the custodie of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Townsmen and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yielded vpon themselves by Embassadors: whom they sent to the Romans, whilist they were on the way. Neither were many dayes spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in 40 the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the King his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the answer, because it should be gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, That hee should quite abandon his Dominions on this side of Taurus. For their charges in that warre they required fiftene thousand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thousand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thousand, in twelue yeeres next ensuing by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some more 50 of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, very earnest they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thous the Aetolian, with some others who had stirred vp the King to this warre, delivered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily haue perceived, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The Kings Embassadour had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enjoyed. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to send immediatly to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Volsus. The Ætoliens desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make Warre vpon the Ætoliens, the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes, that Antiochus was already vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to bee so thoroughly settled by one Victorie, but that many things might fall out worthe of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Prouince changed.

Soone after this came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodiens and some others: yea by King Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approoved. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned vp his owne deserts: and comparing himselfe with Masaniissa, hoped that the Romans would bee more bountifull to him than they had bene to the Numidian,²⁰ since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masaniissa was onely such in title; and since both he and his father had alwayes bene their friends, euen in the worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what he would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtesie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At length he craued that they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Countrey by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpose to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought hee it needfull, that they should trouble themselves with the care of giuing libertie to many of the Greeke Townes, that were on Asia side. For since the most of those Townes had bene partakers with the King in his Warre; it was no reason that they should begainers by his overthrow. The Rhodiens did not like of this. They desired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Grecian liberty: and to call to minde, that no small part of Greece it selfe had bene subiect vnto Philip, and serued him in his Warre: which was not allcaded against them as a cause why they should not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the maine point whereon they insisted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans against King Antiochus was so great, as easily might satisfie the desires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this; and very bountifullly gaue away so much, that euery one had cause to be well pleased.

Such end had the Warre against King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now forasmuch as the surname of The African had bene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought conuenient by some, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Asiatick: which the fortune of his Victorie had no lesse deserued; though the vertue, requisite to the purchase thereof, was no way correspondent.

The Ætoliens, and the Gallogreeces, vanquished by the Roman Consuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other obstructions) with attempting to haue passed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Bookes of Hermetes; and that Inscription, SIMONI DEO SANCTO, The ingratitute of Rome to the two Scipios: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobilitie.

¹⁰ MARC. FULVIUS and Cn. Manlius had the same charge diuided betwene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now styled Asiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Asia. And for this reason was it apparent, that L. Scipio had graunted to long a Truce to the Ætoliens. But since, in this long interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not sought to humble it selfe to the Roman Maieste, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowlie termes than any other of the Greekes. The best was, that so great a storme fell not vnexpected vpon the Ætoliens. They had foreseene the danger, when their Embassadours were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the last remedie; which was, to entreat the Rhodiens and Athenians to become intercessours for them. Neither were they so dejected, with any terrible apprehensions, that they could not well deuise, euen vpon helping themselves, by repurchase of Countreies lost, where they spied advantage.

Poore King Aminander liued in exile among them, whilst Philip of Macedonia kept, for him, possession of his Lands and Cattles. But the Athamanians (besides that manie of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing bene long accustomed to serue a Mountaine Lord, that conuersed with them after an homelie manner; could not endure the proud and insolent manner of command, vsed by³⁰ the Captaines of Philip his Garrisons. They lent therefore some few of them to their King, and offered their seruice toward his restitution. At the first there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vnderooke the worke. Yet assurance, that all the rest would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. He was at the borders with a thousand Ætoliens, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themselves into foure parts, occupied, by the readie assistance of the multitude, foure the chiefe Townes in the Countrey, to his vse. The fame of this good successe at first; with letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their best in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of⁴⁰ Philip vnable to thinke vpon resistance. One of them held the Towne of Therium a few dayes, giuing thereby some leasure vnto his King to provide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home six thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, he left all saue two thousand and bound him, & so came to Athenium, a little Athamanian Cattle; hat still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedonia. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium awhile, to take place lying ouer Argitheia, that was chiefe of the Countrey. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldnesse to descend vpon Argitheia, or that they might perceiue the Athamanians,⁵⁰ all along the hill sides, readie to come downe vpon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: specially when Aminander came in sight with his thousand Ætoliens. The Macedonians were called back from wards Argitheia, and presently withdrawn by their King towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure.

The

The Athamanians and Ætolians way-layd them, and pursued them so closely, that their retreat was in manner of a plaine flight, with great losse of men and armes; few of those escaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Ætolians, hauing found the businesse of Athamania so easie, made attempt, in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently reuolted, and became Ætolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had beene euer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke armes at first; but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbours ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and seeing their owne King so hastily gone, as if hee meant not to returne.

Of these victories the joy was the lesse; for that newes came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Consul his bailing with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that he had recouered his owne from Philip with such helpe as hee could get. Neither seemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were illaure correctors, nor earnest reprovers. Fuluius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had beene the chiefe seat of Pyrrius his Kingdome. 29 With this hee began; for that it was of too great importance to bee abandoned by the Ætolians; yet could not by them beerecused, vnlesse they would adventure to fight vpon equal ground. To helpe the Ambraciens, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driuen from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who invaded the Countreies of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadors came; who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any violence of the assaillants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consul had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so be driuen to leaue vnto his successor the honour of finishing the warre. Wherefore he gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bade them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouer-deare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. He also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediator, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his persuasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demands and excuses, the conclusion was such, as was grievous to the weaker, but not vnsubuerable. The same Embassadors of the Athenians and Rhodians accompanied those of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made very grievous complaint about the losse of those Countreies, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it hindered not the peace, which those good Mediators of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly sollicite. The Ætolians were bound to vphold the maiestie of the people of Rome, and to obserue diuers Articles, which made them lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they hauing been the first that called these their Masters into the Countrey. The Ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achaens, by flattery pressing their owne right) that so they might haue possession along the coast of Greece, whilst they seemed to forbeare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was set downe an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require require to haue the Romans Iudges of the controuersies, when they should arise. And hereof good vse will be shortly made: when want of employment elswhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consul, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallo-Greekes and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victorie, his acts were the consummation. Hee visited those Countreies on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at warres, without regard of the great alteration happened in Asia. From euery of these hee got somewhat, and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Prouinces, into which hee should els haue wanted an errand. He was euen loaden with bootie, when, hauing fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gallagreekes. These had long dominated ouer the Countrey: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their forepassed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such trial, when they served vnder King Antiochus, as made them to know themselves farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon the River Haly, in an Inland Countrey, where those enemies were not like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation, that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeld: then was no counsaile thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carrie or drue, to betake themselves vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled; and that finally, 30 when he had staid there awhile, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Gallagreekes had beene carelesse of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if the stones would haue serued well enough to that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of armes, than impediment in disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily preuaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallagreekes, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor hauing prepared their stones before hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensiuie armes, could not hold out against the arrowes and 40 weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driuen from a piece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, vp into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong downe the steepe rocks. Few of the men escaped aliae: all their wiues, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation ouercome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saved themselves by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backes.

These warres being ended: Fuluius and Manlius were appointed, by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsul his Prouince for another yeere. Fuluius, in his second yeere, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to those whom hee had vanquished; as likewise to Araratius the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for feare of the Roman armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laide vpon them such conditions, as hee thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto he

he swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadors, whom hee sent for that purpose. Finally having let in order the matters of Asia, he tooke his way toward the Hellepont, laden with spoile, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallogrecians had in so many yeeres extorted, from the wealthie Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull use, which the Roman souldier had bene wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous household-stuffe, and flaves of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and, in a word, with the feedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Countrie of Thrace lay betwene Hellepont and the Kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his iourney homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians; either for that he passed through them, without any such bootie as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with an huge traine of baggage, the Thracians could not so well containe themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than verie pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry; seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he understood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne Kingdome, if the People of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Ætolians, promising moreover to restore vnto him all the Greece Cities, that had bene taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference betwene him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euene dealing of the Romans, after their victorie, to giue away not onely the halfe of Asia, but Chersonesus and Cylinachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie, to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was growne into neere acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spain and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they wanne from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw these vpstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, aduanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wile, that he had not so halfly declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that hee had ioynd with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might haue bene freed from his insolent matters. But what great argument of such discontentednesse the Macedonian had, we shall verie shortly be verged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleued, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Countrie. They knew all aduantages: and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had alreadye passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behind: though both the getting, and the sauing, did cost many liues, as well of the Barbarians as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius; whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did verie bitterly tax, as an vnworthie Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that he made good answere, and was approved by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthe of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to haue hindered the peace with Antiochus; they said, That with much adoe he was kept from leading his Armie ouer Taurus, and aduenturing vpon the calamitie threatened by Sybil's verses, vnto those that should passe the fatal bound. What calamitie or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyl's propheticke threatened the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before-hand wonne, in a sort, the Countreies on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But wee finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this propheticke, fell out neere about one time, with the restitution of Ptolemie King of Egypt; that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tulle noteth, sowed at random in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by euent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolemie to his Kingdome by Gabinus the Roman, should haue any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers haue bene well pleased to interpret Sibyl's in that propheticke. Of the Sibylline prædictions I haue sometimes thought reuerendly: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke, few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authoritie. But obseruation of the shamefull Idolatrie, that vpon all occasions was aduanced in Rome by the bookes of Sibyl, had well preuailed vpon my credulitie, and made mee suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Engelbins: when that learned and excellent worke of Master Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinal Baronius, did altogether free mee from mine error; making it apparent, That not onely those prophesies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was foretold, but euen the bookes of Hermes, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever deuised them) by the vnderiect zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forcaine proofes. And in the same ranke, I thinke, wee ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Engelbins from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue bene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it bene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then liued and flourished, would haue abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of SEMONI SANGO: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebel, had many ages before bene consecrated SEMONI SANGO, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sanguis, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should bee mille-read, SIMONI SANCTO, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sanguis, thereupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, finde credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historiall, than was conceived by the Authour. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten, post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a 10 few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which hee brought into the Treasurie, was made the last payment of those monies which the Common-wealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punicke warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, euen as long as hee well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the heat of an Inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipios were called, one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this accusation, knowne to Politicke. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that 20 such vnworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasurie, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answer came; hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which hee passed through the middelt of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, hee told the People, That vpon the same day of the yeere hee had fought a great battell with Hannibal, and finished the Punicke Warre, by a signall victory. In memory whereof, hee thought it not fit 30 season to bragge at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitall, and there giue thanks to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods, by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, hee had well and happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-wealth. And hereto hee invited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the seventeenth yeere of his life, vntill hee now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had preuented the capacitie of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still bee like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the Court, followed Scipio; leauing the Tribunes alone, with none about them, excepting their owne laues and a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement, vntill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, 40 vnrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: hee willingly relinquished the Citie, and his vnthankfull Romans, that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time hee spent at Literum: quietly, with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome againe. How many yeeres hee liued, or whether hee liued one whole yeere, in this voluntarie banishment; it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere, with Hannibal and Philopomen, as also of his priuate behauiour at Literum, render it probable, that hee out-liued the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to haue drawne him backe to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. Howsoeuer it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to worke with L. Scipio the African. They propounded a Decree vnto the People, touching monie receiued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasurie; That the 50 Senate

Senate should giue charge vnto one of the Prators, to inquire, and iudicially determine, thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of singular induritie; frugal also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde hee was euen faultie: for though hee would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was hee vnmisericfull and vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poysoned with enuie, troubled both himselfe and the whole Citie, whilst hee liued. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobility, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his owne ranke, men raised by desert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrie, whose Lieutenant hee had been at Thermopylae, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carrie it, hee tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious periturie. That he had not brought into the common Treasurie some vessels of gold and siluer, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipios grew partly, (besides his generall spight at the Nobility) from his owne first rising, wherein hee was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was giuen vnto himselfe, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whole Treasurer he then was. For when 20 Cato did utter his dislike of the Consuls bad husbandry (iudging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no neede of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies hee published, or for want of iudgement, thinking unworthy of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall, whose noble deedes confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipios, whilst it was nourished by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio, his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuerer inquirie and 30 iudgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was scene condemned in a summe of money, farre exceeding his abilitie to pay. For non payment, his bodie should haue bene layd vp in prison: but from this rigour of the Law hee was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his hauing bene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had bene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kinned, friends, and Clients made such a collection for him, as would haue set him in better 40 estate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessity vsed, being redeemed for him by his nearest friends.

And thus began the ciuill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not bene, or not bene much regardable, vntill now, since the Punicke Warre. Securitie of danger from abroad, and some want of sufficient employment, were especiall helpes to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great securitie her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while containe themselves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrellsome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselves ouer-matched by their aduersaries, at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first with clubbes and stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the streets, vnto battail in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Ladie of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, Gracchi, saw those her two sonnes, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At these times the Senatours began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie; vnder this forme, Let the Consuls provide, that the Commonweale receiue no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemie to the State, they thought to haue woon a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But alter the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned, who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senatours: whereupon began the ciuill warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who preuailed therein, meanes to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Caesar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraigne power, when by the like Decree of the Senate hee was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consul had finally cause to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution such authoritie to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes, by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in neede of a Soueraigne Lord: so the vehemencie of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselves, when they were ouer-topped by voyces in the Houfe, did compell Caesar, to giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith preuailling against his aduersaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate, nor People, should thereafter be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principall Citizens, lost their owne freedom, and became subiects vnto the arbitrarie gouernment of One: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on Earth, to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleued of her selfe as if she had, whilest a King sat crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequelle will discoure.

CHAP. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

§. I.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrelled with Philip. They dealt insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being wearied for warre, obtains peace at Rome, by his sonne Demetrius; of whom thenceforth hee becomes zealous.

AFTER the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had bene, before the arriuall of the Romans in those parts: yet in verie truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassalls to the People of Rome. For of those due Prerogatiues belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomsoever fewer it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and Warre, To bestow Monie, and to reserve (as the French call it) le dernier resort, or the last Appelles, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolute, that is, The Appelle, or last resort, as euery pettie iniurie offered to each other by the fore-named Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senatours themselves within Rome: from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, he or they were beaten, and enforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities verily dissolved. Neuertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Officers of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary; neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of seruitude the severall Estates of Greece did bow verie gently: either as being thankfull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly grievous; or, as being skillfull in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, since therein consisted their chiefe hope of thriving; or, as being more fearefull of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes living further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre and peace, together with the diuersion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auailable to him, that his Kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not thoroughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) were they very loning vnto Macedonia, and to his Houfe, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion settled in Africk: as likewise afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others: holding people in subiection vnto themselves, by the ministerie of Kings; especially of such Kings, as were vsfull and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; and shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his Kingdome. But such magnanimitie was none otherwise contrived by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their Estate, and a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore, notwithstanding that hee had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his Country, prepared the waies for them, and furnished them both with vituals, and other things needfull, to transport them ouer the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie and Thrace, hee was commaunded to abandon the Cities of Ennus and Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them hee had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themselves.

These Townes of Ennus and Maronea had bene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North-west, extended his dominion very farre. He is thought to haue made himselfe Lord of Transylvania: in which Prouince it is said, * That innumerable Medals of gold haue bene found, in the age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victoria. Of all these Lordships the possession, or rather the title (for hee liued not to settle his estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicator by right of warre, wherein he vanquished and slue Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolemie Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gauls, which the Kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his succours: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gaulles being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had been oppressed by them, recovered their libertie; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to find their aduantages, and make vse of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by thefe, King Philip did prouide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of 10 his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætolians, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answer, That his Garrison did only laue it from the Thracians: who, as soone as hee thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Ænus and Maronea. That they were places vnable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his Kingdome. But this Plea had not auayled him, 20 in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Countrey thereabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former warre. And since they, by their victorie had gotten vnto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at libertie, whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia and Cherfonnesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demeanour of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges betwene him and all that 30 made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Nevertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatsoeuer he had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either hee was likely to preuaile, or at leastwise to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what hee had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had bene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their libertie, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature hee was verie cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little joy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might sacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done, but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue bene 50 feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majestic, to an accompt. He would haue remoued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites; affirming, That they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable

to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And herof he willed the Embassadors to enquire, among the Maronites themselves: as well knowing, that they who furnished, were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not utter an offensive word. But he found the Romans more seuer, and more thoroughly informed in the bulinesse, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainly told, that if he would discharge himselfe of the crime objected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet 10 he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should bee at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not bene at Maronea, nor nere to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because he should tell no tales; hee tooke order to haue him poisoned by the way. By this wee see, that the doctrine, which Michael taught vnto Cesar Borgia, to employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne invention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodly policie, the later hauing bene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth here in England, can beare good witness; and therein especially the 20 Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniuall Law that himselfe had deuided, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, and were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before he was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his younger sonne Demetrius as Embassador vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints; and withall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in such wise that if ought were amiss, yet might it appeare that he had bene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present, Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate; as hauing bee 30 well approued by them, when he was hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat; were it only in regard that would bee borne vnto his person.

Whilst this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilst he, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadors, that had bene Iudges betwene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betwene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedemonians against the Acheans. It was objected vnto the Acheans, 40 That they had committed a grieuous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedemon: That vnto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the wallles of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycon, then Prætor of the Acheans, made answer, That these banished Lacedemonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously knowne to bee the men, who had themselves committed that murder, whereof shamefully they laid the blame vpon others: the Acheans hauing only called those vnto iudgement, that were supposed to be chiefe authors of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintives hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, 50 as they were coming to make answer for themselves. Concerning their throwing downe the wallles of Lacedemon, hee said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibit vnto them all kinds of fortifications; as the Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedemon had wofull experience) of Tyrants and Vfurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these wals, and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycorgus his ordinances; and governed the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Acheans; they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedemonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countreimen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselves thus constrained, to answer and giue account of their actions; as vassals and slaues vnto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Acheans as well require to bee satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselves, to take account how things went at Lacedemon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatnesse, and intimate, as they began, that the libertie of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselves to ratifie it: then must the Acheans haue recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, and which without perurie could not be violated; as reuerencing, and indeede fearing the Romans; but much more, the immortal gods. To this bold answer of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state vpon him, he pronounced more like a Maister than a Iudge, That if the Acheans would not be ruled by faire means, and came thanks whilst they might; they should be compelled with a mischief, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This alteration was in the Parliament of the Acheans; which groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet Feare prevailed above Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romans to doe as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadours restored some banished and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very soone after, did make void all Iudgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Acheans vpon any Citizen of Lacedemon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedemon, should bee suffered to continue a member of the Achaean Common-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had beene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discovered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achaians, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slaerie had the Greekes, and all Kings and Common-wealths whatsoever, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselves; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile and persuasions of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all subdued by the Romans, and, by seeking Patronage, made mere vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie preuaile with them, but their private passions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of selfe ruine, brought them from the honour which they enioyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greekes very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoever he should take armes, as shortly lie he was like to doe. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignant soone following. Hee had beene louingly vsed at Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate. There being confounded with the multitude of obediencies, whereto his youth, vnskillfull in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer: it was permitted vnto him, to reade such brieue notes as hee had received from his Father, and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction; more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then laid and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the entreatie of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans; did increase in Philip his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a ialousie of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadours from Rome; some bringing one commandement; some another; and some, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had beene imposed vpon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that observed his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that hee had done things vn-willingly, and would be obedient, no longer than he needs must. With these Embassadours young Demetrius was contentant: rather perhaps out of simplicitie, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deal more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder sonne of the King, should not succeed vnto his father; but that the Diademe should bee conferred vpon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by mere fauour of the Romans. This offended not only Perseus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his younger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this ialousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

§. II.

The death of PHILOPOEMEN, HANNIBAL, and SCIPIO. That the militarie profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to proue the contrary.

40

HHe Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptorie with the Acheans; that they seemed not vnlike to take part against them, in any controuersie that should be moued. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achaean Common-wealth, hauing long bene of a contrarie Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themselves from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, seuered from communion with any other. This was the deuce of some that were powerfull in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-strongly affected in the businesse; were careful to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achaean League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that bloud should bee drawne, and either side so farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Vpon the same of their commotion and proceedings; Philopomen, then Praetor of the Acheans, leuied such forces as hee could in haste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Acheans, especially of the Metropolitans, were soone in a readinesse to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horfe; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians, whom he charged, and forced to runne. But whilst his horsemen were too earnest in following the chace; there arrived, by chance, a supplie of five hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopamen his horsemen to turne backe. Philopamen himselfe had long bene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatness of his courage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetie, which had so willingly aduentured themselves vnder his conduct. He tooke vpon him to make the Retreat: and suffering his horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching ouer-neere to him. But it fell out vnhappy, that being callt to ground by a fall of his horse, and being withall in very weake plight of bodie, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleueed their fortune to bee so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleueed, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ran forth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They 20 caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfie themselves with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the singular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in deliuering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrary wise, Dinocrates and his Faction were delirious hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leave any disgrace, or iniurie, done to him, vnravenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had bene made for the custodie 30 of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heauie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not staid long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poison, which Philopamen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsemen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe, when he heard an answer to his minde, he said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was scuentie yeeres old, and weakened with long sicknesse, whereby the poison wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Achaens, when they missed him in their flight, were maruellously offended with themselves, for that they had bene more mindfull to preserve their owne liues, than to looke vnto the safetie of so excellent 40 a Commander. Whilst they were deuising what to doe in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadors were forthwith dispatched vnto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire means would not serue. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Armie against Messene: who coming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had bene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the althes of Philopamen that were carried home in solemne pomp to Megalopolis; where they were all 50 of them slaine at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martius, a Roman Embassador, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadors were seldom absent. He would haue entremitted in this busines of Messene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassador to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the warre against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spitefull enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (there in vnworthie of the Crowne he ware) did readily condiscend: or rather (as Lucius thinke) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him shueto Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiors were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deuised some secret sallies vnder ground to saue himselfe from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedie: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to saue himselfe from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, he tooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwayes preferred for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of aduerser fortune; which being readie to swallow downe, hee vttered these wordes: I will now (said he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath so many yeeres 20 pasttised them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victorie of FLAMINIUS ouer me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall neuer bee numbred among the rest of his heroicall deedes: For, if it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the World, how farre the ancient Roman vertue is degenerated and corrupted. For such was the noblenesse of their forefathers, as, when PERSIUS invaded them in Italie, and was readie to give them battaile at their owne doores, they gaue him knowledge of the treason intended against him by person: whereas these of a later race haue employed FLAMINIUS, a man who hath heretofore bene one of their Consuls, to practise with PERSIUS, contrarie to the honour of a King, contrarie to his Faith giuen, and contrarie to the Lawes of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliuer up his owne Ghest. He then curiously 30 ling the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal gods to reuenge his iniurie, dranke off the poyson, and died.

In this yeere also (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopamen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Capitaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we haue now finished, had he bene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authoritie might haue commanded such supplies, as the Warre which he vndertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne up the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home; as his proper vertue, wanting publicke force to sustaine it, did 40 lastly dissolue it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Countrey and Commonweale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and ialousie of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more vnprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Capitaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and ialousie of men; the spoiles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries layed on the labouring man, are so hatefull to God, as with good reason did Monsieur the Marshall of France confesse, That were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them per- 50 mitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoeuer, this is true, That the victories, which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardice of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues haue rayled them about the leuell of their inferiours, and haue furmounted their enuie: yet haue haue they been rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Luinius, L. Amylus, and this our Scipio, whom we haue lately buried. Among the Greekes we reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that Dauid bequeathed vnto his victorious Capitaine Ioab. With this face Alexander beheaded Parmenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Attius: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was stricken in the world; for there fell of those that fought beside runne-awaies, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Attius he had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian [lue Attius] murdered the Emperour, which he neuer durst attempt, Attius liuing. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Attius, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolved then obscured. The same unworthy destinie, or a farre worse, had Bellisarius; whose vnder takings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and he died a blinde begger. Narses also, to the great preiudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Iustine. That Rule of Cato 29 against Scipio, hath bene well obserued in euery age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot bee accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and in deed a Turkish one, That euery warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than suffer his owneglorie to be obscured by them. For this cause did Batatz the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Viziers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gen- saluo, who draue the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortez, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Capitaines of all Nations haue been paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary it may bee said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places haue been giuen, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which haue traiterously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the aduantage of some 40 commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vnderferuently were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnesse of their warlike vertue; is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of the Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius; but he was a coward; and with a barbarous cruelty, seldom found in any other than cowards, hee slue first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him again by Heraclius: who tooke from him the Imperial Crowne, vniuilly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Le- ontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre, Iustine, hauing recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same same fashion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iustine, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastasius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surpris'd his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for hauing wrenched the Scepter out of his hands, hee enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue bene repayed with their owne cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruell, or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Capitaines to make themselves Kings, haue by Gods iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thriving, by the practice of Armes, is to take what may bee gotten by the spoile of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserued. But scarce one of a thousand haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vnthanketulnesse in this kinde, hath bene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: Little Cattie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore & 15. and wiseman therein, and hee deliuered the Cattie by his wisdom: but none remembered this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thanks, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselves to haue bene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiser sort of them thinke to fauour of some impotency in themselves. But in this respect they are oftentimes cozened and abused: which proves that weakenesse to be in them indeede, whereof they so gladly thinne the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thanks; yet so, as those thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Capitaines haue made, by enriching themselves with the spoile of the enemy, they are very inquisitive to search into it, and to strip the well-deservers out of their gettings: yea most iniuriouly to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, haue purloyned somewhat from the common Treasurie. Herof I neede not to produce examples: that of the two Scipios being so lately recited.

30 In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie she was constrained to vndertake, her Majestie had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martial men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeeres had, yet, according to the destiny of that profession, I do not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Majestie had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witness, who in all her daies neuer received dishonour, by the cowardise or infidelitie of any Commander, by her selfe chosen and employed.

40 For as all her old Capitaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cumfable, Bowchier, Barkely, Bingham, and others: so those of a later and more dangerous imploiment, whereof Revice and Pere were the most famous, and who haue done as great honor to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as euer any did: those (I say) with many other braue Colonels, haue left behinde them (besides the reputation which they purchased with many trauias and wounds) nor title nor estate to their posteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Estates.

50 That her Majestie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did sooner beleene other men than her selfe, a dis ease vnto which many wise Princes, besides her selfe, haue bene subiect, I say that such a confidence, although it may seeme altogether to excuse her Noble Nature, yet can it not burin some sort accuse her of weakenesse. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that where where the prosperous actions are so exceedingly prized, the Actions are so vnprosperous and so generally neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that those which are nearest the person of Princes (which Martial men seldom are) can with no good grace commend, or at least magnifie a Profession farre more noble than their own, seeing therein they should only mind their Masters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing lesse honour and reward to men of farre greater deservings, and of far greater vfe than themselves.

But his Maiestie hath already paid the greatest part of that debt. For besides the relieuing by Pensions all the poorer sort, hee hath honored more Martial men, 10 than all the Kings of England haue done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Haward for his chargeable and remarkable seruice, as well in the yeere 1588, as at Caliz, the Islands, and in our owne Seas; hauing first commanded as a Capitaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maiestie hath changed the Baronies of Montrey and Burley into Earledomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Russel, Carew, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chichester, Barons, for their governments and seruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elsewhere.

§. III.

PHILIP making provision for warre against the Romans, deales hardly with many of his owne subjects. His negotiation with the Bassarnes. His crueltie, &c. suspected by his sonne Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slaine, by his fathers appointment. PHILIP repenteth him of his sonnes death; whom he findeth to haue beene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on Perseus, he dieth.

QUINTVS MARTIVS the Roman Embassador, who trauielled vp and downe, seeking what worke might be found about Greece, had received instruction from the Senate, to vse the most of his diligence in looking into the Estate of Macedon. At his returne home, that hee might not seeme to haue discouered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatsoeuer they enjoyed him; yet so, as it might appeare, that such his obedience would last no longer, than meere necessitie should enforce him thereunto. Hee added further, That all the doings and sayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was deuising. Now it was indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithfull obsequiounes to the Romans, 40 and foresaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with safety of their honour, if they could finde conuenient means; or otherwise (as to him seemed apparant) by what means soeuer. He was in an ill case: as hauing beene already vanquished by them; hauing lost exceedingly both in strength and reputation; hauing subjects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would adventure to take his part: yet hee provided as well as hee could deuide, against the necessitie which hee daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cause to suspect, that they would doe but bad seruice against the Romans, hee compelled to forsake their dwellings, and removed them all into Emathia. The Cities and Countrey, whence these were, transplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whose faith he thought a great deale more assured, against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, hee deuided vpon alluring the Bassarnes, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the ruer 50 of of Danubius, to abandon their seat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardaniens, and take possession of their Countrey. These were like to doe him notable seruice against the Romans: being not only stout fighting men; but such as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefit that could be hoped by their arrival, must be the vtter extirpation of the Dardaniens; a People alwaies troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whensoever they found aduantage. Neither was it iudged any hard matter, to periwade those Bassarnes, by hope of spoile, and other incitements, vnto a more desperate Expedition 10 on, through Thyria, and the Countreys vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe.

It was not knowne who should withstand them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peraduenture some others, through whose Countreys they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans, were it only in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remouie of these Bassarnes from their owne habitations, into the Land of the Dardaniens, vpon the border of Macedon; along and tedious journey vnto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countreys through which they were to passe. And thus hee sought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neuer knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them; since he was not like to finde assistance from any ciuill Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuices were long ere they tooke effect: so as the Bassarnes came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time he neglected not the training of his men to warre, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and flood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wils to forsake 30 their ancient dwellings, and betake themselves to such new habitations, as hee in his discretion thought meetest for them, were vehemently offended at the change: Yet their anger at first confined it selfe within words: hee hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise then by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which also he did vnwillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessitie, that seemed apparant. This euill therefore would soone haue been determined, had not his cruell and vindicative nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just sorrow: but imputed all to traitterous malice; and accordingly sought reuenge where it was needefulle. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none 40 of them deseruedly. This encreased the hatred of the people; and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generally, when the King in a barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom he had injured, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill he should haue massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmannerly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical then perhaps he could haue desired, gaue men cause to thinke (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, hee felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the Kings yonger sonne. It may 50 well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention betweene the brethren, but only to cherish the vertue and towardliness of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this yong Prince, and his mutual respect of them, bred extreme jealousy in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romans, the manner of their life, life, the falshood of their apparell, or the vnslightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were jested at in ordinarie discourse and table-talk, Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praying them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his dayly conuerfation with their Embassadors, as often as they came, gaue his father cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder sonne Perseus: who fearing so much lest his brother should step betwene him and the succession, conuerted wholly vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty yeeres old, of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five yeeres, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free speeches discovered. The jealous head of the King hauing entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder sonne, a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious iustification of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great solemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus: They cleft in twaine a bitch, and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailes, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first originall, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the King between his two sonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into two parts: which, vnder the Kings two sonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vying poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victorie: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-earnestly seeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds giuen, euen with those stakes, vntill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himselfe was fortior this, as it had been some bad preface: but his friends were glad, and though, that hereof might be made good vse. They were of the craftier sort: who perceiuing which way the Kings fauour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addrest their seruices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to obserue what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himselfe so indifferently, that hee was taken and well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doores. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leaue none of his traine behinde, but forced them also to beare him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselves secretly to preuent all danger. Yet was there such good espial kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked vp his doores, as if he stood in feare to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondred to see himselfe excluded, and feared very angrily with his brother. But Perseus, bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accused the younger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the same that hath been here recited, save that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which which did aggravate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had vnderaken this murder, and would perhaps also dare to vnderake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romans; by whom hee knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him; because hee bore a due respect vnto his father, and was sorie to see him spoiled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they fought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof he cited a letter, sent of late from T. Quintius to the King himselfe: whereof the contents were, That he had done wilily in sending Demetrius to Rome; and that he should yet further doe well to send him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honorable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counsaile was giuen by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegiance of those, that should wait vpon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become seruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as hee remembered them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that conuerted matters of Pastime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he fought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him; Hee said that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at leastwise from their opinion thereof: so as by any impious practice, hee were more like to lose it wholly, than to encrease it. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The King pronounced like a father, though a ialous father, That he would conclude nothing vpon the excuse or error, whatsoever it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better obseruation of their liues, manners, and whole carriage of themselves both in word and deed. And herein hee may seeme to haue dealt both iustly and compassionately. But from this time forward, hee gaue himselfe ouer wholly to Perseus: vying so little conference with his younger sonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, He liked neither to haue him present, nor neere vnto him. About all, he had especiall care, to learne out what had passed betwene Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philoles and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interrelated in the quarrels betwene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose scale they had counterfett) vnto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices vniustifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should neuer take effect, for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abettor, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuse did forcibly perwade the King, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom hee gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if he had pittied the estate of the vnhappy Prince; and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discovered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome; where he might hope not onely to liue in safety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than hee could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reuerfion vnto the Crowne of Macedon. Whatsoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falshood of Didas, who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, and in the meane while reucaled the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his sonne to death, without further experience of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare lest

the Romans should take the matter to heart, and held it as prooffe sufficient, at least, of the Kings delight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commended to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accursed Minister of his Kings vnuadvised sentence, first gaue poison to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Rufians, to finish the tragedie: who villanously accomplished their worke by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not beene found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne blood. The houses of Lysimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or even vpon their heeles; by intestine discord and ialousies, grounded on desire of soueraigne rule, or feare of losing it. By the like vnaturall hatred, had almost beene cut off the lines of Ptolemie and of Selenus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grievously diltamped. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that vpstart family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it selfe to marvellous greatnesse, in very short space, from the condition of meere slavery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is said to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a patterne for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enenies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But Hee was himselfe of a vnmisericfull nature; and therefore vnmeet to bee a good perswader vnto kindly affection. The murders by him done vpon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his bloud-thirsty appetite he delightedfully had committed vpon many innocents, both strangers, and subjects of his owne, did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded Him with a draught of his owne Poison. After the death of his sorne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had bin objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found he nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to thinke, that malice had not beene contriuer of the whole proceffe. His only remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which hee tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no lesse to be feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his vnuall trouble of minde, and carelesnesse of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betwene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, hee was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death; and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with suspitious imaginations; the like whereof hee had neuer beene slow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed; and so much the more, for that he knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hateful to Perseus: and thus becoming subiect vnto the same ienious impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsaillor, when he found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and giue ease to the King, vntill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philotes and Apelles, (the Embassadors which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the busines: made diligent inquirie inquire after the truth. In thus doing, hee found one Xyebus, a man most likely to haue vnderstood what false dealing was vsed by those Embassadors. Him hee apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying that this fellow knew all, and must therefore bee made to vtter what hee knew. Xyebus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himselfe, that hee had beene employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme, when hee vnderstood, that by the vnaturall practice of one son, he had so wretchedly call away another, farre more vertuous, and innocent. Hee raged exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the authors of the mischiefe. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, Philotes was taken: and either forasmuch as hee could not deny it when Xyebus confronted him, yeelded himselfe guilty, or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that hee should neede to flie the Countrey: yet not so stout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdome, towards Thrace, whilst his father wintered at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngenerous sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonus. But his weakbody, and excessive griefe of minde, so disabled him in the trauell hereto belonging; that ere hee could bring his purpose to effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwayes full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himselfe, with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, he might thanke his owne peruerse condition: since his vnckle, King Antigonus, had left vnto him estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it ealie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires; if hee had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore hee was iustly punished: by feeling the difference betweene the imaginative happinesse of a Tyrant, which he affected; and the life of a King, whereof hee little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen whilst yet it was only drawing neere, was fore signified vnto Perseus, by Calligenes the Physician; who also concealed it awhile from those that were about the Court. So Perseus came thither on the suddaine, and tooke possession of the kingdome: which in fine hee no lesse improudly lost, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IIII.

How the Bassarne fell vpon Dardania. The behaviour of PERSEVS in the beginning of his Reigne. Some warres of the Romans: and how they suffered MASANISSA, cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrell with PERSEVS. They allow not their Confederates to make warre without their leave obtained. The Treason of CALLICRATES; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrells to PERSEVS. Hee seeks friendship of the Achians, and is withstood by CALLICRATES. The Romans discover their intent of warring vpon him.

Immediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Bassarne into Thrace: where order had been taken, long before, both for their free passage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrey. This compact was friendly obserued, as long as none other was knowne than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that should be done, or sustained, for his service. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all dastard and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford so good markets vnto these strangers, as formerly they had done. On the other side, the Bastarnæ would not be contented with reason, but became their owne carvers. Thus each part having lost the rich hopes reposed in Philip, grew carefull of thriving in the present; with little regard of right or wrong. Within awhile they fell to blowes; and the Bastarnæ had the vpper hand, so as they chased the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vse of their good fortune. For whether by reason of some ouerthrow, receiued by them in assaulting a place of strength; or whether because of extreme bad weather, which is said to haue afflicted them as it were miraculously: all of them returned home, saue thirtie thousand, which pierced into Dardania. How these thirtie thousand sped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It seemes that by the careless vñing of some victories, they drew losse vpon themselves: and finally tooke that occasion, to follow their companions back into their owne Country.

As for Persus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his Reigne, to embroyle himselfe in a warre so dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to proue. Wherefore hee wholly gaue his minde to the settling of his Estate: which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himselfe, as the condition of his affaires should require, either for warre or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion: he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To winne loue of his people; he sat personally to heare their causes in iudgement (though herein hee was so ouer-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceiued this his vertue of iustice to be no better than fained) as also he gratified them with many delightfull spectacles, magnificently by him set forth. About all, he had care to auoide all necessity of war with Rome; and therefore made it his first worke, to send Embassadors thither, to renew the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate saluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was he negligent in seeking to purchase good will of the Greekes, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein so excessively bountifull, that it may seeme a wonder, how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, he became so griping and tenacious. His teare was indeede the masting passion, which ouer-ruled him, and changed him into so many shapes, as made it hard to discern which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For prooue of this, there is requisite no more, than the relation of his actions past and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, busie in warres against the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquished, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They also conquered Isfria; subdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had some quarrels, though to little effect, with the Silyrians and others.ouer the Carthaginians they bore (as euer since the victory) a heauy hand: and suffered Masaniissa to take from them what he listed. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romans. Masaniissa therefore had great aduantage ouer them: and was not ignorant how to vse it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoeuer he desired, ere their complaining Embassadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had hee once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrey of Emporia: and so did hee vse them againe and againe; with pretence of tide, where hee had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masaniissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within awhile, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wife Sophonista, and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Masaniissa take from them by force: and by the Romans, to whose iudgement the case was referred, was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome.

They

They had scarcely digested his iniury, when Masaniissa came vpon them againe, and tooke from them about seuentie townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grievously they were oppressed by reason of two articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masaniissa, invading their Country, howsoeuer he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was confederate with the Romans, they durst not presume to beare defensive armes against him, but suffered themselves to be eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that either they might haue fairer iustice; or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hand; or at least, if right must wholly giue place to fauor, That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Masaniissa should bee allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them vnderstand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gaue them peace; and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselves in honour should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Iudges; than continually to line in feare, and none otherwise draw breath than at the mercie of this Nomidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embassadors threw themselves prostrate on the ground, weeping in hope to moue compassion. Here may wee behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant house of the Barchines; of their irresolution, in prosecuting a war so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their halfe penny worthing, in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they seruants, euen to the seruants of those men, whose fathers they haue often chased, slaine, taken, and sold as bondslaves in the streets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africke and Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often and so earnestly desired. Onely they want peace with Masaniissa, once their mercinarie, and now their master, or rather their tormentor; out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, and adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might haue bene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battell at Canno; then Hannibal that wanne it was vsed by the Carthaginians; they had freely bestowed, euery man of them, all his priuate riches, vpon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publike, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreme want, to set out an armie into Spain, at what time the enimie lay vnder their owne wals. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians hauing fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pittifull behauiour bred peradventure some commiseration; yet their teares may seeme to haue bene mistrusted, as proceeding no lesse from enuie to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamitie. They thought themselves able to fight with Masaniissa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leaue as they sought, of defending their owne right by armes: but contrariwise, when without leaue obtained they presumed so far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they receiued a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the sonne of Masaniissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craved audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where hee was demanded the reason of his comming; and had related vnto him the complaint made the Carthaginians against his Father. Hee answered, That his Father not being thoroughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage,

Pppppp

had therefore not given him instructions, how to deale in that businesse. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held counsell diuers nights, in the Temple of Æsculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not be ouermuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the People of Rome. This answer gaue little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replied, that for Masaniſſa his sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoeuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the covenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to enioy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa, bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willing him to tell his father, that he should doe well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians, (for feare of vrging them vnseasonably to rebellion) or Masaniſſa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masaniſſa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better vantage in the future; by Masaniſſa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should bee vanquished; hee made none other account, than that all Affricke round about him and Carthage therewithall should bee his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not bene vnmindfull of Perſeus. They visited him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. These hee entertained kindly at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Bastarna were thence gone; though he protested, that hee had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which they said (that he did vnto other some. Where he did harme to any; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where hee did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Delopians, his subiects, vpon what occasion it is vncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slue Euphranor, whom he had appointed their gouernour. It seemed that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed so farre, vnlesse either they had bene extremely prouoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoeuer it was that bred this courage in them: Perſeus did loone alay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romans tooke very angrily this presumption of the King: euen as if hee had invaded some Countie of their Italian confederates, and not corrected his owne Rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the yoke with the Carthaginians; wherto had hee humbled once his necke, they could themselves haue done the part of Masaniſſa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had bene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league betwene them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greekes, and generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall termes: whom vially they rewarded with a frowne, whensoever they presumed to right themselves by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achaens had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraordi-

inarie fauour at Rome caused them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messenians by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats, when they tooke vpon them to carry any businesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuertheless, vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; especially in vnrping the practice of armes, which belonged onely to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard lesson, they were such vntoward schoolers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharp correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Roman Senate, being delirious to humble the Achaens; refused not only to giue them such aide as they requested, and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betwene them; but further, with a careless insolencie, rectified this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemie might not be supplied from Italie, with victuals or armes. Here with not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argues, Laedemonians, or Corinthians, would revolt from the Achaens; they themselves would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them. This was presently after the death of Philopemen: at what time it was beleueed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not vpheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achaens had vterly subdued the Messenians far sooner than was expected; and when as not onely no Towne rebelled from the Achaens, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ill-fauoured grace, tell the same Embassadors, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie) That they had strictly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a faigned grauitie, to haue serued their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume vnto themselves a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make warre, whether offensive or defensive; though it were against mere strangers; without interpoling the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnlesse peraduenture sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Roman arts howsoever many (for gainfull or timorous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Onely the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, hauing neither subiects of their own that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subiection; for want of more noble argument whereto to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselves in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Antiochides: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratu-lators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-wealths and Kingdomes, that with ouer-nice diligence stroue to preserve their liberties and lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to be deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most vnpliant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to haue affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were better to bow than to breake.

Neither

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greekes at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subjects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopomen had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, Wherinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger: but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselves grieved with the present subiection, wherto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fall out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to chooe among themselves none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrey, and would for no ambition, or other servile respect, bee flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domestical conspiracies would soone bee at an end; when honestie and love of the Common weale, became the fairest way to preferment. Of this careful provision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not thoroughly advertised: eyther because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadors, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traytors (of whom every Citie in Greece had too many) as were men vnraged among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truly; or perhaps because the Embassadors themselves, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to concale that which many know, from those that are feared or flattered by many. The Acheans being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceive the advantage, which mischievous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, have against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselves into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that hee chose much rather to betray his Countrey, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore instead of well discharging his credence, and alleadging what was meetest in iustification of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppress both the Acheans, and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heauy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the settling of their authority, among his froward Countreymen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of 40 confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee had in regard; any in iunction from Rome notwithstanding. Hence grew it, that the Acheans both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselves, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not be so, if He, and some other of his opinion, might have their wils: who ceased not to asseme, That no Columes or Monuments erected, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrarie. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themselves, That the multitude refused to giue 50 care vnto such persuasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which vnderooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase increase apace, and they became the prevalent faction. It was therefore strange, how the Fathers could so neglect the aduancement of those, that fought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiesty. More wisely, though with seditious and rebellious purpose, did the Greekes: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert; only for hauing vttered some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers, hearing these and the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obdurate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolved to follow this good counsaile, in euery point; yea to deprecate all those that held with the right, and to set vp their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to 10 Polib. Legat. 30. this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Acheans, than had bin their maner in former times; but wrote at the present vnto all Cities of Greece; requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedaemon) should bee fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates; they aduised all men, to be such, and so affected, as hee was, in their feuerall common-weales. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Countrey into the way of ruine, but himselfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheless he forbore to want himselfe, of his eloquence vsed in the Senate. Onely he reported his Embassage, that all men became feare- 20 full of the danger, wherewith hee threatened those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such arts hee obtained to be made Pretor of the Acheans: in which Magistracie, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might feru to manifest his ready obsequiousnes vnto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatening termes won many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberrall gifts, and hopeful promises, to assure vnto himselfe those that ill could brooke his enemies; got inced a multitude of partakers, though little honestier than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans; some with the Macedonians; and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates, where- 30 in they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not sufferable, That a King, no better than their vassall, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of his trespasses: wherof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall afford them iust occasion to make war vpon him. Perseus hauing finished his busi- 40 nesse among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his armie along with him; yet went, and returned, in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worse for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himselfe to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadors or letters: praying them, That the 50 memory of all wrongs whatsoever, done by his father, might be buried with his father; since his own meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his neighbors. The Romans perhaps could haue bene pleased better, if he had behaued himselfe after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostilitie in his passage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken such a journey, without their licence, this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the loue of the Acheans: which his father had so lost, that by a solemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was ienalousie perhaps, no lesse than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoeuer Philip had by many vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arati, given them 50 cause to abhor him: yet in the publike administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall consent, they resolved to forsake him. Wherefore it was need- full, euen for preservation of concord among them, to vse all circumspectiōs; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, to- wards wards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends, But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of warre, and when all danger of innovation was past; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nourishing deadly hatred, without leauing meanes of reconciliation. And hercof the Achaens reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the Kingdome of Macedon: yet vnderstanding what would be due to them, if they should aduenture thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to passe, that their bondmen, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their masters could not fetch them, ran daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the losse of such, as made of their slaues very profitable vfe. But Perseus took hold vpon this occasion: as fitly seruing to pacifie those, whose enmitie saine he would haue changed into loue. He therefore apprehended all these fugitiues, to send them home againe: and wrote vnto the Achaens, That as for good will vnto them, he had taken paines to restore back their seruants; so should they doe very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not runne away againe. His meaning was readily vnderstood, and his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearsed by the Pretor, before the Councill. But Callierates tooke the matter very angrily; and bade them be aduised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans. Herewithall he tooke vpon him, somewhat liberally, to make the Achaens before-hand acquainted with the warre, that was comming vpon Perseus from Rome. Hee told them, how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had bene made away, because of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly He rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alleged by the Romans; the inuasion of the Bastarnes, vpon the Dardaniens; the Kings journey against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behaviour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he aduised them, to expect the euent of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answer was made by the Pretors brother: That Callierates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings cabbinner, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renued his league with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that He had louingly entertained their Embassadors. This being so: why might not the Achaens, as well as the Ætolians, Thessalians, Epirots, and all the Greekes, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuertheless Callierates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-little gainesay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answer made the whilest, That since the King had only sent a letter without any Embassage; they knew not how to resolue. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and conuenient. But when Perseus, herewith not contented, would needs vrgue them further, and send Embassadors: then were they saine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, & deny to giue audience: which was prooue sufficient (to one that could vnderstand) of the condition wherein they liued. For harkening to this aduice of Callierates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassador: whereby it became apparent, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

§. V.

§. V.

How EUMENES King of Pergamus was busied with PHARNACES, the Rhodian and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom hee accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and condemns his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The vnsuall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. PERSEVS his attempt vpon EUMENES. The brotherly loue betweene EUMENES and ATTALVS. PERSEVS his deuote to payson some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the iustice of this warre.

EUMENES King of Pergamus had bene troubled, about these times; by the Kings Pharnaces and Atiubridates his neighbours. He had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, and promise, That they, by their authoritie, would end the businesse, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselfe; and brought the Enemies to seke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this being at good leisure, hee began to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore hee was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his owne honours (whereof the Greekes, prodigal in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to wax euery where stale: whilst Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuie borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and withes. For despite of this indignitie, Hee stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping these rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore and indirect courses of reuenge. The Lycians could not be faued by his patronage, from seuer and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodians. This reuened him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of belittling, little different from robberies, made him hateful to those which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achaens, as too vnm easured, misbecoming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deserrings. All this which he needed not to haue regarded, had hee not bene too vainely ambitious of himselfe, especially for his being ouer-fruicible to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which it fell, the libertie of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse hereof; hee thought it vaine to striue any longer with bounty, against such an aduersarie, as by hopeful promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therefore hee resolu'd euen to ouerturne the foundations of this Popularity, by inducing the Romans vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian Kingdome, which all so vainely worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather hee was like to bee highly thanked, for setting forward their withes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the Kingdome, as he had bene rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end, he made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bassarne into Dardania; that of Perseus himself against the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermeddling in business of neighbours; his riches; and his great provisions: were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Only He descended vnto particulars, hauing searched into all (as hee professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, That Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and five thousand Horse of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand mercenaries for ten yeeres; armies, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him soldiours as many as he should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driuen, either to liue vpon 10 spoile, or to take from his owne subiects. Herewithall Hee prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus the sonne and successor of Antiochus the Great, had given his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bithynia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wile the sister of Perseus; and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared Hee to tell them, (though seeming loth to vtter it plainly) That euen the enuie of their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied, or iustified (as that hee had procured the death of some 20 which were friends to the Romans; and that hee had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplify vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them; since it would bee to himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

Polyb. Legat. 74.

Lius lib. 45.

It were too great folly, to beleue that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, lest hee should set vpon them in Italie. Neuertheless forasmuch as they loued not to make warre without faire pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were given to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. 30 Now though it were so, that He told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadours, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere Hee had committed any open act of hostilitie against them; their iniustice, and oppression, would haue bene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatening them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselves: who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and 40 securitie? Toward this iustification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto; their more then vsual curiositie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadors were at Rome, provided of answeres to the words, which they knew beforehand that he would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to haue disclosed all: when the warlikest of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearefull apprehension; against which, it behooued their wisdome to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore carelesse audience was given to the Rhodian 50 Embassadors; who accused Eumenes as one more troublefome to Asia, than Antiochus had euer been, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conueighed by Sea vnto Perseus, his bride Laodice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully required, so the Romans despatchfully accepted.

accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were settling themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadors came from rome with strange newes, which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as mere vassalls, but as dependants and associates. For proofe hereof, they referred themselves vnto the commentaries of the ten Embassadors, whom they had lent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victorie against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masaniassa, The Ætolians, and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subiects, had cause to find themselves agreed if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subiects might easily be made their fellowes, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was only to plague the Rhodians, for their good will to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors; which indeed more nearly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his loue to 10 Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelessly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to find cause of anger. For whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to giue them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might fauour of hostilitie; but that, if his trauaile in this kind proued vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falls out contrarie to expectation. These big words may seeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from 30 instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to doe by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliuerance from the Roman seruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps vtterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weakenesse of spirit, vnswearable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subiect (in appearance) to Fortune; which might haue bene his, had he knowne how to vse it.

40 Now that this brauerie (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings owne heat; it appears by his daring to adventure soone after, on a practice that more iustly might anger the Romans; and giue them fairer shew of reason to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphin in his way, and there doe sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischievous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure stout ruffians to do the murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mud wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised 50 with great stones, and left for dead. They might haue finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because he should not discouer them. Eumenes was conueighed away to the little Isle of Læ- gina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as king, and either took or would haue taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of state) Stratonice the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom hee then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue, That when the King returned aliae home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, received none other checke, than that hee should forbear to marrie with the Queene, untill hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in especiall fauour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to haue transferred the Kingdome from his brother to Him. By such concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus rayled and vpheld: as might also that of Macedon haue bene, if Demetrius had liued and employed his grace with the Romans; to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad when he vnderstood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had suad all from discouerie. But as hee was deceived in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes liued: so was He 20 beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which hee vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For He had written to one Praxos a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertaine the men whom he sent about this busines: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassador then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundisium: who coming newly from the court of Macedon, laden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassador, and thereof discharged himselfe. Brundisium was the ordinary Port, for ships passing betwene Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherein he gaue entertainment, being a wealthie man, to Embassadours, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journeying to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitalitie, he was commended to Perseus, and invited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadours, the King was studious to requite. At his coming he was much made of, and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings secrets. The summe of all was, That he must needs doe a turne, in giuing to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare qualitie, sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should bee tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at libertie, hee discovered all. Rammius was but one man, 40 and one whom the King had neuer seene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the Kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellows affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe, and in like sort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to haue had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such obiections were not to be made vnto a King, to proue the rightfulness of making war vpon him; but rather vnto a subiect pleading for his life in judgment. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger prooffe (which might haue bin easie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very luteable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such priuate offences, it gaue him no priuiledge; they judging him to haue offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if hee might might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not send men, to walle the Kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Towns: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe it by Poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadours to denounce it vnto him, vnlesse hee would yield to make such amends as they should require. Hee seemed at this time to haue been so confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his enemies the more calme. Hee caused the Embassadours to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe, and bade them do their errand. They made a tedious rehearfall of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that He had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embassadours sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their maner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue stood vpon the euidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxos. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground wheron to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, welbeloued, and well friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Insolent, & vnderminers of him by their daily Embassadours, that were no better than meer spies. Finally, hee promised to giue them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league, made betwene them and his father, and renewed by himselfe: indeed onely for feare: but willed them to descend to more equal conditions, wherupon he, for his part, would aduise, as they might also doe for theirs.

In the forme of the league betwene Philip and the Romans, as it is set downe by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Liuie inserts a clause, whereby hee was expressly forbidden, to make any warre abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederats were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that hee could no more make warre abroad, than if hee had been restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would vrge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not beare defensive armes, without their permission: then had Perseus very iust reason to finde himselfe aggrieved. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whilst they themselves were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations hee maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as vniuall, hee ministred occasion vnto the Embassadours to giue him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message; hee commanded them to be gone out of his kingdome in three dayes. But either hee should haue been lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serue him to vndertake the warre; hee should courageously haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediately, whilst the Enemy was vnprepared; not haue lost opportunity, as now and often hee did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

§. VI.

The Romans sollicite the Greekes, to ioyne with them in the Warre against PERSEVS. How the Greekes stood affected in that Warre. The timorousnesse of PERSEVS. MARTIUS a Roman Embassadour deludes him with hope of Peace. His forces. Hee takes the field, and winnes part of Theſſalie. The forces of LICINIUS the Roman Consul: and what assistance the Romanes had in this Warre. Of Tempe in Theſſalie, and what advantages the Macedonian had, or might haue had; but lost by his feare. PERSEVS braues the Romanes; fights with them; knowes not how to use his victorie; sues for Peace; and is denied it by the vanquished. PERSEVS hauing the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Boeotians rebell against the Romanes, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the warre against PERSEVS. They reue the Greekes their friends; for whose cause the Senate makes promise, hauing heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romanes beene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian warre, that well they might haue been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde-hand in provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitee of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleuee, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes; and others, who mult afterwards dearly pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeede any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the dissension betwene their feuerall citates; howsoever the generalitie of them were inclined the same way. Neurtherlesse Embassadours were sent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadours vied as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to be denied. But the Greekes were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtelie: and vnderstood, that not only such as made rescuall, but euen they who might seeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly; were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romanes; * the Achaeans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, euen when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their dutie. It is strange, that men could bee so earnest to set vp the side, whereof they gladly would haue seeneth the ruine. The vulgar sort was euer where addicted to Perseus, of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus than to the Romanes. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though hee * iudged the victorie of Perseus, like to proue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romanes ill to thrive, that so the Greekes might recover perfect libertie: for his endeuours in which course, hee was at length tyrannically handled, as shall bee shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, that that an extraordinary feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperiall Citie, made the Achaeans and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romanes. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himselfe. He had vnderaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not only to his owne Kingdom, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romanes. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speake the enemie faire, and sue for peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euery small thing would serue to terrifie him; and consequently, that it should at times be in the Romanes power, by giuing him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take reuenge at leisure vpon those which had afflicted him: little cause was there, why any should adventure to partake with him. He made indeede a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, hee sought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadours. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadours, and a man of more finenesse in cunning than was vsuall among the Romanes, made shew of inclination to the Kings desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the King intreated, and obtained a meeting at the Riuer Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereunto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him, yet the Embassadours, and especially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently bee done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the King lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might haue done much, ere the Roman army could haue been in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, he no way increased his forces; he suffered a most convenient season, of winning vpon the enemie, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had bin with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation between him and the Romanes, whereby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better; and what great hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadours also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intre it them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romanes, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodness of his cause, he should be denied peace. These were poore helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honor, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the vmoost of his ambition. This his fearefulness might seeme excusable, and the blame thereto appertaine vnto the Greekes; who deceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessity, that was partly their owne: had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a manly beginning to the war, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averse from him; and were careful, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to do against the good liking of the Romanes. The Boeotians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romanes: to whom further, in a sort, they yielded the selues as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall forme; but caused their feuerall townes to make covenant apart each for itselfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little common-weales they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebel) haue such force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This work, of separating the Boeotians from Thebes their head; was more than Agellans could effect, or Epaminondus would suffer, than when all Greece followed the Lacedemonians. So far more available to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondus and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with King Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedemonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilst the King late still, as being bound by the truce: and hauing done this, he returned to the Citie, where vaunting what hee had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reprooued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as hee should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadours which Perseus had sent; audience 10 was giuen to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie, would serue their turne; the Senate being resolu'd before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the Citie, and had thirty dayes respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: where, as they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walles, in the Temple of Bellona (the vusual place of giuing audience to open Enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had only the short warning of eleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtisie serue alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if hee had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely mean, both to keepe a long while 20 from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee should need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Lucinius, the Roman Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soone, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their King at Pella. Which, though it were enough to haue rouzed Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was hee content to deliberate awhile, Whether it were not better to offer him selfe tributary to the Romans, and 20 to redeeme their good will with some part of his Kingdome, that so he might enjoy the rest; than to put all at once to hazzard. But finally, the stoutest counsell prevailed; which also was the wisest, and so would haue proued, had it been stoutly 30 and wisely followed. He now began, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should haue bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawne together, and appointed their Rendezvous at Citium, a towne in Macedon. All being in readines, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honored in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse: whereof about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry Nations, most part Thracians; the rest his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with liuely speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the 40 goodnesse of his cause, the greatness of his prouisions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their seuerall abilities. He gaue them thanks: but answered, That his owne prouisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Countrey, in their iourney towards him. Some Townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselves; some he barked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wanne by force. Of these last was Style, a towne thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly then proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a fallie; which 45 the the Townesmen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All crueltie of warre was practised here: to the greater terror of the obliuious. So Velatiae and Connus (towns of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Hauing well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sycerium, a towne seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where hee rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemy.

Lucius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes, and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the seuerall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the kings abroad; Masaniassa sent thither his sonne Masagones, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twentie Elephants. Antaratbes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his yong sonne, there to bee brought vp: yet hee did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe began witting awhile, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than hee had beene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing 20 the Romans. Antiochus and Ptoleme (though Ptoleme was then yong, and vnder Tutors) had busines of their owne; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romans, which they cared not to performe. Gentius the Ilyrian was inclinable to the Macedonians: yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a prettie trick, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, serued him, for this his counterfeit good will. This king had foure and fiftie shippes, riding in the haue of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose: all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind sort; making shew to beleue, That for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoever Gentius thought in 30 the beginning; hee foolishly lost both his kingdome and himselfe, in the ende of this warre; by offering, rather then giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what hee brought ouer the sea, Lucinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painfull iourney, through the mountainous country of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had beene ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great overthrow. He refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the river Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he 40 resolved, to abide where he then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the Countrey. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece belides: as hauing beene freed by them from a more heauie yoke of bondage to the Macedonians, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefite. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautiful valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it these huge mountaines, Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poetic) with their Spurres or branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessalie. 50 And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vntill they would make an hungrie iourney, thorow the countrey of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater greater he might haue had, if by mispending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worke; yea to winne vpon them (for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done far greater things, had hee leized vpon the fliights of Atos, which his father once kept, and defended all the countrie behind the Mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, mult the Romans haue either traueled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to be found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needefull, vnto the mercie of seas that were very dangerous; if they would haue fought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps be said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King muir haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too farre from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Atolians, vpon whom the Albanians depended, grew into suspicion with the Romans (as we shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Bacilians, how politickly fouer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselves desperately in the Macedonian quarrell: what would they haue done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after awhile began to wauer, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, then they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and increased the number of his well-willers, yea and bought downe with money (as hee might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head, then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; and to render the libertie, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginarie. Such benefit of this warre, since it was hoped for after wards, might with greater reason haue bene expected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuier stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such actes, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue wonne the victorie: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to auoid the danger of that war, whereof hee should haue fought the honour; hee left his friends that would haue stood by him, and gaue them cause to prouide for their owne safetie: yet being overtaken by necessitie, he chose rather to set his back to the mountaines of Tempe, and defend himselfe with his proper forces; than to bee drinen into such miserie, as was ineuitable, if he gaue a litle further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Thessalie, it is hard to shew particularly; for that the historie of those things is much perished. Wherefore we muir be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arriued; kept within his trenches, and lay still encamped by the Riuier of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time; did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore hee invited the Romans into the field; by walking the land of the Pheraens; their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduenture euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victorie his owne. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselves to bee safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaime skirmish. The Capitaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, awhile together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldnesse much increased; and much more, his reputation: to the griefe of those, who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The towne of Sycorium, where Perseus then lay, was twelue miles from the Romans: neither was there any conuenient watering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but he was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirlic when they came to fight. For remedie of these inconueniences, he found out a lodging, seuen miles neerer to the enemy: whom he visited the next day by the Sunnerising. His coming at such an vnusall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though hee brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vsit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessary, and resolved to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore he sent forth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Capitaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature to trie their fortune: he himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honor of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victorie in a manner entire, (though the Thessalians made a good retrait) with litle losse of his owne. But hee discouered his weaknesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great teare lest he should assaile their Campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Capitaines, though vnent for: he neuertheless took it for sound aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victorie; by which meanes it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at leastwise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it been greater, and had hee wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue been the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euen when he had the victory, what else did he, than proclaim vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keepe him from yielding to the Romans, whensoever they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victorie would admit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twenty horse and forrie foot. The Roman Campe, after this disaster, was full of heauinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would let vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remooue to a furer place beyond the Riuier Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud tearmes, to draw vpon himselfe a greater calamitie. So he passed the Riuier in the dead of the night, and encamped more firogly on the further side. The Atolians were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greekes followed them. Fieue of them, that were men of speciall marke, had been obserued to be the first which turned their backs: an obseruation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greekes might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they should shunne indignation, or incurre favour, then muir they aduenture no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne libertie. Thus fared it with the Consul and his armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes error; which how great it was, hee not vntill then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could neuer haue have attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to have rowted them, whilst they were conveying themselves to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might have been done, since there was no remedie. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselves, Pretors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather up the spoiles of them without resistance, as yielding themselves overcome. With such braue words did the King set out the glory of his action; dividing the spoiles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honor found. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way betwene Tempe and Larissa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neuertheless hee was easily perswaded to vie the occasion, which he seemed to have, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent vnto the Consul, and offered to yield vnto the same Conditions, wherein his lathes had been bound to the Romans; if the war might so take end. It were needlesse here againe to shew the folly of this course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a truce, whilst Embassadors might goe to Rome: it reling in the Senate and People to approve the conditions, and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no smal discommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none; saue that Perseus would yeeld both his Kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius, to be so resolute in aduersitie. On the other side, it argued a very faint heart in Perseus, that hauing received an answer so peremptory, hee still persisted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the King withdrew himselfe backe to Sycorium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the sonne of Masaniissa, with the aid before mentioned. This distance betwene the King and them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their haruest: about which businesse they ranged ouer all the fields. Their carelesse demeanour gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which hee attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe he thought to haue fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, hee failed in the enterprise. As for the forrangers, he had a good hand vpon them, if he could haue withdrawn it, and giuen ouer in time. But whilst hee strove to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul; by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was overcome. This misadventure, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few daies, to fall backe into Macedon; as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was; whereby what losse he felt, will appeare hereafter. He left all behinde him, saue onely Tempe, weakly guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Connius, hoping to haue taken it, and so to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned backe vpon the *Perrhebian*s and others; from whom he wanne some townes, and among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme not to haue belonged vnto the Thessalians; vnlesse, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account; for that the histories of them are greatly defective. One may thinke it strange, that the Bacians, whom a Roman Embassador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his

owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Naue on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the art of Martius; were more true to Rome, than other petty townes, which by that same distraction of the Bacians, became within themselves more absolute, than formerly they had bene. The causes hereof were to haue bene sought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were thoroughly punished by Lucretius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoiling them, that he would haue brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreme oppression hee could haue driven them so farre. Neither was Licinius the Consul indiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in general; That in the warre which he made, he * cruelly and couetously demeaned himselfe.

* Lin. lib. 43.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hofilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Pretor of the Fleet. Hofilius shewed more of his indoltrie, in picking quarrels with the confederats of Rome, than in prosecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman warre vpon his kingdome, after that the Consul had fought pottage in vaine ouer certaine mountains, Perseus seemed, in a manner, * free from it. He was troubled indeed

on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul felt thither with an armie of foure thousand, and who, by leaues made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Pyssana, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such carelesse order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; failed forth vpon him, ouerthrew him, and chased him so farre, that hardly hee escaped with a fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of Pyssana shortly after became Roman: which howsoever it happened, Perseus very soone recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys, a Thracian king, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, recruited from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painefull iourney into Ætolia: where hee was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Roman faction; yet in his returne home, hee tooke in Aperantia; and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe thoroughly beaten by Cleues, one of his Lieutenants. Such success had the Macedonian war vnder Hofilius. The same Consul offended much the Greekes, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadors traueiling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who fought not by might and maine to aduance their bulines, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopomen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achaean horse, but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which hee well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue bene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitee, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no colour of truth could be found, that might giue countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, and giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hostages, and found some in the Councell that approved the motion: as also among the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garriisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction; accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, donian, but also the good Patriotes; making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thanks of their base flatterie; rating them openly in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, even in presence of the Embassadors. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselves, as men that could beleue none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should bee free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vntlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. 10 Of this decree the whole countrie was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedie of many inconueniences. But they that standing on priuiledge hereof, refused to fulfill euery commandement, were numbered among the Patriotes, which in the end of this warre, prooued little better, if not worse, than to haue been Traytours. The Senate was driuen to set downe this order; by reason of the many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, and especially by the Admiralls, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great summe of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to haue their subiects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to 20 amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seeke redresse of iniuries, or to offer their seruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the lesser Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets; and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would bee singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the Towne Rome, and appointed anniuersarie games to bee celebrated among them, in honour of that 30 Goddess. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolemie, and the like vaine men, that would bee thought gods; or at the shamelesse flatterie of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, diuine honours; when hee sees a Towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a Goddess, and receiuing (without shame of the giuers, or shame of the present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

§. VII.

Q. MARTIVS the Roman Consul, with extreme difficultie and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardize of PERSEVS in abandoning Tempe. The towne of Dinm quitted by MARTIVS; repaired and fortified by the King. The Romans attempt many places, with ill successe. Their affaires in hard estate. MARTIVS a cunning and a bad man. POLYBIVS sent Embassador to MARTIVS from the Acheans. POLYBIVS his honest wisdom beneficiall to the Acheans. King EYMESES growes auerse from the Romans. PERSEVS negotiates with ANTIOCHVS and EYMESES. His false dealing with GENTIVS King of Illyria; whom hee draws into the Roman warre. He sends Embassadors to the Rhodiens; who vainly take vpon them to be arbitrators betwene him and the Romans. PERSEVS loseth a mightie succour of the Bastarnae, by his wretched parsimonie.

After two yeares of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had been thought likely to reforme all those Countreies, and bring them to what pacie the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when hee liued in peace. He had 20 enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the war might prove, and therupon to become wife for themselves. Contrariwise, Licinius and Hofilius the Consuls, had one after the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by many losses received. The Roman Admiralls had so demeaned themselves, that many towns, out of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Roman side; and the armie much lessened, not only by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himselfe (for they laid the blame one 30 vpon the other) in licencing the souldiers to depart Quintus Martius the new Consul, who succeeded vnto Hofilius, was to amend all this: which neuertheless was more then he knew how to doe: though he brought with him a strong supply of men. He began hotly to set the warre on foot, which a long time had slept. And he began the right way: not seeking to force the streights that were surely garded, but taking paines to clime the mountaines which were thought able to forbid all passage over them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vncertaine what way he meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit ascent. But the Consul proceeded in his iourney: with hope, either not to be discouraged by the Enemy, or to breake through all opposition, or at least wife, to fight on as con- 40 uenient ground, as they should haue that lay to stop him, and at length it all failed, to make a safe retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most expedit foot, to discover the wayes. Two dayes was this company troubled, in ouercomming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles after which they had sight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their passage. They occupied therefore a safe peece of ground; and sent backe word to the Consul, where they were, intreating him to hasten vnto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arriual; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together, each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little losse on either side. This bic- 50 kering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the rest were boulders. In this case, it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to returne. Wherefore Martius tooke the onely course remaining; and indeed the best: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend vpon the Macedonians: whilst he, Rrrrrr with with the rest, fetcht a compass about, and fought out wayes that neuer had bene troden. Herein he found extreame difficultie: which notwithstanding he overcame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such journeyes, through places vnfit for habitation: he was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea where Nature might seeme to haue intended, that none should be. So steepe he found the descent of the mountaines, in this way which he took: that of seuen miles, which they trauelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselves downe; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rockes, that stood one ouer another, so vpright, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were afraid of the giddy prospect, and casting their gouernours, made a terrible noise, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Hauiug therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this greivous journey; there was nothing more desired by the fouldiours, then that they might be suffered to creepe backe againe, the same way which they had come. But (sith) was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other sustained by two long postes, fastened in the ground below. Vpon these two postes, or poles, which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should be either cut or broken) were fastned two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, between the higher & the lower fall: so as the end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. These were covered with planks and turf; that they might seeme continuent with the ground; so to make the beasts aduenturous, to goe vpon them. If there were a Plaine of any good extent from the foot of a rocke, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretie way, vpon one of these; the postes vpholding the frame were cut asunder; thereby causing him to sincke down vnto the next bridge; whence he was conueyed, in like manner, to the third, and onward still, to the very bottom. Thus went they downe sliding, some on their feet, others on their buttockes, till they came to an euery valley. By this it appears, how thoroughly provided the Romans vsed to be in their journeyes, of things needfull in all occasions: as also what ineffimable paines they tooke in this descent, about the conueyance of themselves and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they rested; staying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, should haue overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and set vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies journeyes were like vnto the first: saue that culome, and the nearnesse to their wayes end without meeting enemy, caused them the better to endure the labour.

Perseus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: since they fought with his men vpon the passage, three daies together; he lying so high, that he might well nere haue heard the noise. Yet was he so possessed with feare, that he neither stirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Consul, nor made any provision for that which might fall out; but as one void of counsaile, late hearkening after the euent. Foure onely passages there were, leading into Tempe: the first by Connus; which the Romans were vnable to force: the second and third were the same which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the last, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All these were sufficiently guarded: and whoeuer would seeke any other way, must be faine to take such paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer then any of the rest: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, saue through the valley it selfe, into which they must first pierce another way. Dium stood vpon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the sea: of which mile, the river Helicon becoming there a lake, and called Baphyras, tooke vp the one halfe; the rest being such as might easily haue bene fortified. Besides all these, there was in the middelt of Tempe, a passage which ten men might easily keepe: where the

the spurres of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neare to the verie banks of Peneus, a goodly and deepe riuer which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had bene more easie, than to make the Consul repent him of his troublesome journey: if Perseus could haue seene his owne aduantages. For the Roman armie was not only in ill case to fight, after the vexation of that miserable trauell; but must needs haue either perished for want of victuals, or bin enforced to returne the same way that it came, if the King had made good the freight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants and carriages, against those rockes, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it seemed a matter of impossibilitie: especially considering, how the enemy from above their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they stole away from him. It may therefore be thought strange, that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the side of Ilyria, whence that kingdome had often bin invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themselves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were there arrived, there was no means to escape, without forcing one of those passages, which they despaird to winne. But the cowardize of Perseus, did commend the counsaile by them followed, as wise. For he no sooner heard that the Enemy was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; then he feared like one out of his wits; saying, That he was vanquished, and had lost all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away in haste; and straightwayes abandoned the Towne. In the same vehemencie of amazement, he sent a strait commandement to Thessalonica, that the Arsenall there should be set on fire; and to Pella, that his treasures there should be cast into the sea: as if the Romans were like presently to be masters of these two Cities. Nicias, who was appointed to drowne the treasure, performed it hastily as well as he could: though soone after, his master grew sorie for the losse; and it was all, in a manner, recovered by Diuers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to set fire on the Kings Arsenall, deferred the execution; foreseeing that repentance might follow: and so he preuented the damage. Whether Nicias, for his absolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull providence, merited the greater commendation, or more easie pardon; it rested in the King to interpret. The reward of their seruice was this. Perseus growing alhamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this halitie direction; caused them both to be slaine. Also those poore men, which had fetcht his treasure out of the sea by their diuing, were payd their wages after the same sort: that so there might be no winites of the Kings base folly. Such end must they feare, who are priue to dishonourable actions of great Princes. If Perseus would haue gone surely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleue him to be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacite. He thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stoped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Alepiodatus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; saying, that they had betrayed vnto the Enemy the gates and barres of Macedon. Of this reproch, if they would discharge themselves, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thercinto: since the Roman armie, this notwithstanding was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He tooke Dium without resistance; & thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing trauelled about a dayes iourney, and gotten one towne that yeelded, he was compelled, by meer lacke of food for his men, to returne backe towards Thessalie. His fleet came to him, in this time of needfullie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the war: but hauing left behinde at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the provisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had beene carefull to occupy the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies only might come be brought into the army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was desirously expected; he forsooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish journey (if not worse then foolishly) he lost more, than a little the longer falling had bin worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountains; for otherwise it had bin madnes to put himself on such an enterprise, so slenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or light of the Enemy, he should be faine to quite it. Howsoeuer it was: men 10 thought him a coward, or at least a bad man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behoued him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe; vnderstood his owne error; fought to hide it by such poore means as haue bin shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the town of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dismantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped strongly by the river Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would haue bin enough, not only to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might 20 cause the Romans to seeke a good end of the war vpon faire conditions, & not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the towne of Heraclea, standing on the river of Peneus, fure miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could; and was not giuen vp for feare. After this Martius did set a bold face towards Dium, as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admirall to 30 make attempt vpon the sea townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were walled; and some companies, that sundrie times aduentured forth of the towne, were still put to the worse. As for the towne it selfe; there was danger in comming neere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the wals, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall letting saile from thence, ranne along by Aemis, and Antigonea, (landing neare to each of them, and both doing and receiving hurt) vntill he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes ioyned with him, bringing twentie ships of warre: and fure other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this assistance of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his 40 fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the town: while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken there, for that it lay not vpon the bank. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were arches in the town walled vp with that earth, and covered with one single row of brick. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by sapping the wals. To this worke he appointed such as hee thought meetest: giuing an alarme to the other side of the towne, thereby to shadow his attempt, the breach was soon made. But whilest the Romans were shewing for joy, & ordering themselves for the assault: the Capitaines within the towne perceiued what was done, & sallying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies 50 that were between the ditch & the wals of whom they slew about six hundred & sunder few to escape vnnoued. This disaster, & the want of good successe on that part of the towne which King Eumenes assailed (a supply in the meane while entering the towne by sea) caused the siege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Capitaine, was gotten before his comming, with such forces, as were not only sufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed siege to it, but to keepe the land about it from spoyle; or at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibea; whether the Consul (that he might not be quite without worke) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terror of his appearing suddenly ouer their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all 10 haste, letting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so farre was their abilitie short of their Enterprises; euer since their Consul (whether dauidly, or carelessly) most vnlike a good Commander had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: Yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harme befell them, or at least, that they were in some greater danger, then is expressed in the broken remaining Historie of this Warre. For Martius perswaded the Rhodiens by Agelippos their 20 Embassador, who came to him at Heraclea about other buisinesse of lesse importance, that they should doe well to interpose themselves as mediators, and seeke to finish the Warre. Now, although Polybius doe most probably coniecture, that this was rather a malicious deuice of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodiens in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; then that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an army on foot: yet since he made shew of feare, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his feare seeme not counterfeite. And so were the Rhodiens moued to thinke of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embassador, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadors of Perseus, & of Gentius the 30 Illyrian did set out their buisinesse at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of some victory, where in he had lately slaine great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we find intimated: though the time place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his army. For they found the Consul wanting men; the Admirall wanting men; & for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and Ap. Claudius the Pretor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so vnable to invade 40 Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extreme danger, so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seeme, that some blow had bin taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at least, that the Romans with greater losse, than is before spoken of, had been driuen from some of the Townes which they besieged.

Now although it were so, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himselfe like a man of war: yet in exercise of Cunning, which one hath most aptly termed, a cracked or snifter kind of wisdom, he dealt as a craftie maller, with a restlesse working diligence. This indeed neither proued his sufficiencie, nor commended his honestie: since thereby he effected nothing to his owne benefit, and neuer thelesse, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or such delight as weak and busie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made opposition to the good of his country. At such time as Perseus, by the successe of his doings against Boetius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought like to invade Thessaly; Arche, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Acheans, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduersitie, whom in prosperity they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Arche proposed a decree which passed. That the Acheans should send their whole power into Thessaly, and participate with 50

the Romans in all danger. So the armie was leuied; and Polybius, with others, sent Embassadors vnto Martinus, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleasure. Polybius found the Consul busied in seeking passage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the armie; and awaited the Consuls leisure till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time conuenient, hee presented the Decees, and offered the seruice of his Nation, wherein sooner it should be commanded. Martinus tooke this very kindly; but said, that he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius dispatched home his companions, to signifie thus much: tarrying himselfe behind in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martinus, that Ap. Claudius desired, or rather imperiously required, of the Acheans, five thousand men, to be sent him into Epirus. It was manifest, that Appius had need of these men; and that if he were strong in field, he might do notable seruice, by distracting the forces of Perseus. But the Labarynthian head of Martinus could not allow of such plain reason. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom hee declared, that Appius had no need of such aide: and therefore willed him to returne home; and in any wise take order that the men might not be sent, nor the Acheans bee put to such needlesse charges. Away went Polybius; musing and vnable to resolue, whether it were for loue to the Acheans, that the Consul was so earnest in this busines; or rather for enuie, and to hinder App. Claudius from doing any thing, since himselfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell, touching this matter: then found he a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne selfe, and those of his partie. For as he was sure to incur the great indignation of the Consul, if he should neglect what was giuen him in charge; so was it manifest on the other side, that the words by Martinus vttered to him in priuat, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they should refuse to helpe Claudius, alleging that he had no need. In this case therefore, he had recourse vnto the decree of the Senate: which exempted men from necessitie of doing what the Roman Commanders should require, vnlesse by special order from the Senate, the same were likewise appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Consul: by whom it was sure to be made frustrate. Hereby the Acheans were sauer, of more then an hundred and twenty talents: though Polybius himselfe ranne into danger of Appius his displeasure; and for such honest dealing in his Countreys behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long years imprisonment.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martinus, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to stand in feare, lest the fire, which he himselfe had helped to kindle, would shortly take hold on his owne lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerthrow al other passions; it is hard to determine: since they that had better means to know the truth, haue not precisely affirmed any certaintie. One report is, that Eumenes did not so much as giue any helpe to Martinus; but coming to haue ioyned with him, in such friendly manner as he did with the former Consuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in such anger, that he refused to leaue behind him certaine horse of the Gallogreekes, being requested to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Consul, did the Romans good seruice: then is the reason apparent, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Attalus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gaue a willing care to Perseus his desire of accord, for mere desire of gaine. And it might well bee, that con-tinueousness drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. How-soever it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be sounde, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to sollicit him by an Embassage. The tenour of his aduertise-ments, both to Eumenes, and to Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betwene a King and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all Kings, though

though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and I vied the helpe of one against another; That Philip was oppressed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Aegyptian, so long as the Romans could make him giue ouer, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either 10 to compell the Romans, to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all Kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more neerely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should giue answer, hee began to offer a bargain of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was afraid. Wherefore he promised, for his owne part, That if he might haue fiftene hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this Warre, then 20 would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to consend vnto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receiue the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but hee would lay downe the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, howsoever the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needes hee would haue part of his wages in prefe. Thus the two Kings did 30 no more, than loose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not stirre. Hercunto Perseus loud, not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliuer him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vrge him to prodigalitie; so as he agreed to pay thres hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus; to the end that all 40 his armie might haue comfort, by such access of strength to their partie. Presently vpon the bargain made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the *Rhodian*s, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, betwene Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The *Rhodian*s thinking that Martinus the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authoritie, would make peace; wilhing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors; gaue an 50 answer, as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vaine glorie of the *Rhodian*s was thoroughly chastised; and more thoroughly should haue bene, if their submission had not bene as humble, as their follie was proud. Such vfe of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Siluer. Now faine he would haue hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantiauchus the Macedonian Embassadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted

him daily to begin the Warre by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprout-ded. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon tenne Talents were sent to Pantarchus: who deliuered it to the young King, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and scaled vp with the scale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Genitus had layed hands vpon two Roman Embassadors, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their loads to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether hee were hyred thereto, or not.

Eu. lib. 44.
Plutarch. 10
vii. Angl.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aide of Perseus, vnder one Clondicus a pettie King, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gauls, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Bastarnæ. These had before hand made their bargain, and were to receiue present pay at the first. At their entrie into the Kingdome, Perseus sent one to them; desiring their Capitaines to come visit him, whome he promised to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the first question that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King had sent money to giue the souldiours their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Hereto the messenger had not what to answere.
Why then (said Clondicus) tell thy master, That the Gauls will not stirre one foot further, vntill they haue gold, as was agreed, and hostages. Perseus hereupon tooke counsaile: if to vicer his owne opinion, before men so wise that they would not contradict him, were to take counsaile. He made an ineffectiue against the inciuillitie and auarice of the Bastarnæ: who came with such numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Five thousand horse of them hee said would be as manie as he should need to vse; and not so manie, that he should need to feare them. It had bene well done, if anie of his counsaillors would haue told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole armie of them, since without anie danger to the Kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perra-bia, into Thessalie: where wasting the Countrey, and filling themselves with spoile, they should make the Romans glad to forsake Tempe, euen for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable seruice, whether they wonne anie vic-torie, or not. This, and a great deale more, might haue bene alledged, if anie man had dared to giue aduice freely: In conclusion, Antigonus, the same messenger that had bene with them before, was sent againe, to let them know the Kings minde.
He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of those many thousands that had bene drawne so farre to no purpose. But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay those five thousand, whome the King would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceiued, that Antigonus could make no better answer, than shifiting excuses; the Bastarnæ returned presently towards Danubius, wasting the neighbours parts of Thrace; yet suffering this craftie messenger to escape unhurt: which was more than he could haue well expected.

Thus dealt Perseus, like a carefull Treasurer, and one that would preferue his money for the Romans, without diminishing the summe. But of this painefull Office he was verie soone discharged by L. Æmylius Paulus the new Consul: who in fifteene dayes after his setting forth from Italie, brought the Kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which G. O. had appointed ouer it a King so foolish and so cowardly.

Of L. ÆMYLIUS PAVLVS the Consul, his journey, He foreseeth PERSEVS to discompe. He will not hazard battaile with anie disadvantage, Of an Eclipse of the Moone. ÆMYLIUS his superstition. The Battaille of Pydna.

PERSEVS his flight. He forsakes his Kingdome: which hastily yields to ÆMYLIUS, PERSEVS at Samothrace. He yields himselfe to the Roman Admirall; and is sent prisoner to ÆMYLIUS.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much dishonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with anie danger, yet the indignitie so moued them, that either * they decreed that Prouince to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwise their manner, to the chance of lot, betwene him and his fellow Consul; or at least were gladder that the lot had cast it vpon him, than that so worthy a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a second Consulship. Hee refused to propound vnto the Senate anie thing that concerned his Prouince; vntill by Embassadors, thither sent to view the estate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderstood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the present remained. This being thoroughly knowne to be such, as hath bene already told; the Senate appointed a strong supplic, not onely to the Consul, but vnto the Nauie, and likewise to the Armie that lay betwene Illyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius sent thither in his place. Æmy-lius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the custome, spake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requested those that thought themselves wise enough to manage this Warre, either to accompanie him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to gouerne their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by hear-say, and censure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speeche of his father L. Æmylius, who died valiantly in the Battaille of Canna, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themselves the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wife and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Æmylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his journey; with an especiall hope of men, that he should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more then could haue bene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundisium:
whence, when the winde came faire, he set saile at breake of day, and arriued safely at the Isle of Cyprus before night. Thence passed he to Dolphi; where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in five dayes more. So are there but five of the fiftene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium; hauing spared no labour of men and of women to fortifie the banks of Enipeus, where it was fordable in drie weather:
So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little pos-sibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium, was lacke of fresh water. For there were tenne myles betwene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betwene the Sea shoare and the foot of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Æmylius found present remedie for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where hee found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no

no shore that wants them, though they rise not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging anie nearer to the enemy, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could performe no service of anie worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had such means to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did; the passage onward, being defended as hath beene shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquire was soon found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perrabia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof; or durst not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his souldiors to make the aduenture; they fearing least it would proue such a piece of worke, as had beene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industrie, courage, and abilitie, to command. He had reformed, euen at his first comming, many disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the souldiors, among other good lessons, to be obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had beene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now he appointed about fise thousand men to this Enterprife: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Aemilianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable service against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darknesse tooke away their ayme, they were liketo make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the flect; where victuals were provided for their journey: it being noyed, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and wast the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where hee lay, rather to diuert the Kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprife, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Chancellor of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay welneare all drie, yet it serued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Aemilius employed none saue his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at farre distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had rayed on his owne banke, did also beat vpon the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Aemilius persisted as he had begun; and continued his assault, such as it could be, the second day. This might haue serued to teach the Macedonian, that some greater worke was in hand: since otherwise a good Captaine, as Aemilius was knowne to be, would not haue troubled himselfe with making such brauadoes, that were somewhat costly. But Perseus looked only vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Then was all full of tumult; and the King himselfe no lesse (if not more) amazed than anie of the rest. Order was forthwith giuen to dislodg: or rather without order, in all tumultuous hast, the Campe was broken vp, and a speedie retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were so, that they which had custodie of the passage weretaken sleeping, or whether they were beaten by plaine force; Scipio and Fabius had very good successe in their journey. It may well be, that they slept vntill the Romans came came somewhat neare to them; and then taking alarme, when their arrowes and slings could doe little service, were beaten at handie stroakes: so as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epistle of Scipio, may each of them haue beene true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had beene effected by Martius in the yeare fore-going; but was closed vp againe, through his not prosecuting so rich an opportunitie.

Perseus was in extreme doubt what course to take, after this vnhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice, to manne his Townes, and so to linger out the Warre: hauing beene taught by the last yeares example, how resolute the people were in making defence. But farre worse counsaile prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King resolued to put all at once to hazard of battaile: fearing belike to put himselfe into anie one Towne, least that should be first of all besieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are jealous) not ouer-carefully relucied, That his was euen the same that Aemilius, or anie inuador, should haue desired. So a place was chosen neare vnto Pydna, that serued well for the Phalanx, and had likewise on the sides of it some peeces of higher ground, fit for the archers and light armature. There he abode the coming of the enemy, who stayed not long behind him. As soone as the Romans had sight of the Kings Armie; which, with greater feare than discretion, had halted away from them, forsaking the Campe that was so notably well fortified: they desired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately; doubting least otherwise the King should change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Consul; praying him not to loose occasion by delay. But Aemilius told him, That hee spake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Campe wherein to rest themselves; nor anie thing there, saue only the bare ground whereon they trode. For these and the like respects, the Consul made a stand; and shewing himselfe vnto the Macedonians, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe measured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; whereinto, at good leysure, hee fell backe, without anie manner of trouble. After a nights rest, it was hoped, both by the Romans, and by the Macedonians, that the matter shoud be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall too blame, for that they had not fought the same day. As for the King, he excused himselfe by the backwardnesse of the enemy; who advanced no further, but kept vpon ground (trusting ill for the Phalanx: as on the other side, the Consul had the reasons before shewed, which he communicated to those about him the next day.

That euening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeare beene Praetor, foretold vnto the Consul, and (with his good liking) vnto the armie, an Eclipse of the Moone, which was to be the same night: willing the souldiors not to be troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might be knowne long before it was seene. It was the manner of the Romans, in such Eclipses, to beat Pannes of Brasse and Balons, as wee doe in following a swarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius conuerred their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, when they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps becaule it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause anie alteration in ciuill affaires, and matters that haue small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More wortheie of obseruation it is, how superstition captiuates the wisdom of the wisest, where the helpe of true Religion is wanting. Aemilius, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone,

Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor about the reach of humane vnderstanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with anie deuout regard thereof: yet could he not retrain from doing his dutie to this Moone, and congratulating with sacrifice her deluerie, as soone as she shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Salpicius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish deuotion, yet is it like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a Sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no lesse foolish. For a great part of the day was vainely consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with anie Sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beastes. 10
At length, in the bellie of the one and twentieth Sacrifice, was found a promise of victorie to Æmylius; but with condition, That hee should not giue the onfet. Hercules was a Greeke, and partiall, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had bene better to call vpon the new Goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authentically) vpon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires, and who therefore would haue limited his fauour, with no iniunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaille; Æmylius was thoroughly persuaded, that the King meant to abide it; for that otherwise hee would not haue stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leysure serued to retyre whither hee listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that hee might wait vpon aduantage, without making anie great haste. Neither was it to bee neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Æmylius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about tenne of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which where to neither of the Generalls had ouer earnest desire. A horse brake loose at wa:ering; which two or three of the Roman souldiers followed into the riuer, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the water, to draw this horse ouer to their owne side. These fell to blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slaine. His countenmen seeing this, halted to reuenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the riuer. Here vpon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generalls placed his men in order of battaille, accordly as the maner of his Countrie, and the armes, wherewith they serued, did require. The ground was a flat leuell, save that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with liuely words; which the present condition could bountifullly afford. But the King hauing finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Liberales. It is the lesse maruaile, that hee durst aduenture battaille, since hee had berthought himselfe of such a stratagem, whereby to save his owne person. As for Hercules, hee liked not the sacrifice of a coward: whose vnseasonable deuotion could be no better than hypocrisie. For hee that will pray for a good Haruest, ought also to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battaille, hee found it no better than lost: and hee, in looking to his owne safetie, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight. 40

The acts of this day, such as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly presse on wards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was therat much astonished; That the Pelignians rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were ouerborne, many of them slaine, and the Squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out aduerse to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to haue rent his coat-armour for griefe. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his deuoyre; the victorie might haue bin his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaille, was the same which doubtlesse the Consul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almost impossibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whilst some of the Romans small battallions pressed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was necessarie (if the Macedonians would follow vpon those which were put to the worke) that some files hauing open way before them, should aduance themselves beyond the rest that were held at a stand. This coming so to passe, admonished the Consul, what was to bee done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vse, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to direction giuen by Æmylius, when hee saw the front of the Enemies great battaille become vnequall, and the ranks in some places open, by reason of the vnequall resistance which they found. Thus was the vse of the Phalanx proued vnauailable against many small Squadrons, as it had bene formerly in the battaille of Cyncephala: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnseasonable against the other, by reason, that being not euerie where alike distressed, it would brake of it selfe; though heere were little such inconuenience of ground, as had bene at Cyncephala. 50
The

Perseus, when he saw his battaille begin to route, turned his bridle presently, and ranne a maine toward Pella. All his horse escaped, in a manner, vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little harme which they had taken, witnessing the little good seruice which they had done. As for the poore footes; they were left to the mercie of the Enemy: who slew about twentie thousand of them; though hauing little cause to be furious, as hauing lost, in that battaille, only some two-score, or sixscore men at the most. Some of the foot, escaping from the execution, ouertook the king & his company in a woods; where they fel to railing at the horsemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and such other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt lest they had ill meaning to himselfe; and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by such as thought it good. The rest of the company disperfed themselves: euery one as his owne occasions guided him. Of those that kept along with their King, the number began within 40 awhile to lessen. For hee fell to deuiling vpon whom hee might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was most due to himselfe: thereby causing those that knew his nature, to shrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella; hee found his Pages and household seruants, readie to attend him, as they had bin wont. But of his great men that had escaped from the battaille, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treasurers that had the boldnesse to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnseasonable admonitions, hee stabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he sent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore standing in feare, lest they that refused to come at his call, should thorowly dare 50 some greater mischief; hee stole out of Pella by night. Of his friends hee had with him onely Eumenes (who had bene employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewise about five hundred Cretians: more for love of his money, than of him. To these he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie talents, though shortly he coozened them of some part thereof; making shew as if hee would haue redeemed it; but neuer paying the moncy. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where hee exhorted the townsmen to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne speech being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to speake what himselfe would haue vttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themselves. Vpon the first fame of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay therein garrison: sending them forth vnder colour of a gainefull employment, and shutting the gates after them. And now to bee ridde of the King; they plainly bad Euander be gone. The King hearing this, had no minde to tarrise: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which hee had there, in certaine vessels that hee found in the riuer Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samothrace: where he hoped to liue safe, by priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

These miserable shifts of the King make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdom fell into the power of Emilius, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was neereat hand, was the last that yelded. About fixe thousand of the souldiours, that were of sundrie Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippius who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had bene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Thyrian, were the first that came in: yeelding themselves and the Towne of Bereia, whither they had retired out of the battaile. With the like message came others from Thessalonies, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole bodie of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such termes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman armie. Emilius sent abroad into the Countrey, such as hee thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found in Pella no more than three hundred talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Thyrian. But within a little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. He sent these letters by persons of such meane condition; that his case was pittied, for that hee wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of his writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in termes ill becoming a King; yet since the iniquity of his Epistle was, King PERSEVS to the Consul PAVLVS; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdom, and would not allow him to retain the Title, refused to make answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could bee expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheless in this conference, hee was marueilous earnest, that he might bee allowed to retain the name of King. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preferred his treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his desire to liue at ease, and be called King. Yea it seemes that hee had indeede, euen from the beginning, a desire to liue in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the war, he was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his Kingdom of Macedon, for * such a paltry Iland; and for that hee offered to lay vp the money which Eme-

ner demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. They vrge him to giue place vnto necessitie, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arriues at Samothrace Cn. Octavius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who assaies, as well by terrible threats, as by faire language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, he had imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serue, a question was moued to the Samothracians: How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiuing into it one that had violated the like holypriuiledge of 10 Sanctuarie, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the King, That Euander, who liues with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleare himselfe in iudgement, hee must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Majestic, now past, makes them forbear to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auail, when the minister of the fact being brought into iudgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeale the author? Perseus therefore willets Euander to haue consideration of the little fauour that can bee expected at the Romans hand, 20 who are like to bee presidents and ouerscers of this iudgement: so as it were better to die valiantly, since none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cause; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Euander seemes to like well; and either kills himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get payson wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had sucked to Perseus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, save his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leaue him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priuiledge of this holy 30 Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gainsay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that also lyable to dispute, which prefers him from captiuitie; hee purpoceth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Corys his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one shippe; who easily was persuaded to wait the King thence. With all secretie the Kings money, as much as could bee so conveyed, was carried aboard by night; and the King himselfe, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that hee had with him onely * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by 40 a rope, and ouer a mudde wall. At his comming to the Sea side, hee found no Oroandes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian trick, and hee was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whilest Perseus was searching all along the shoare: who had stayed so long about this, that hee might feare to be intercepted ere hee could recover the Temple. Here ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging; and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest hee should bee taken; hee hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne vp and downe making enquire; till Octavius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should haue their liues and libertie, with all to them 50 belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had giuen the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victorie complete. If hee had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of liuing, than offraigning therein; hee might well haue brought this Warre to a happier end. Now, by diuiding his cogitations, and purling, at once, those contrarie hopes of sauing his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; hee is become a spectacle of miserie, and one among the number of those Princes, that haue bene wretched by their owne default. Hee was presently sent away to Amylius; before whom hee fell to the ground so basely, that hee seemed thereby to dishonour the victorie ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abject qualitie, and therefore the lesse to bee esteemed. Amylius vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for hauing, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answere might haue bene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, hee answered all with a fearefull silence. Hee was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul rearmed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercie of the People of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, and respectiuey entreated, hee was committed prisoner to Q. Elius.

Such end had this Macedonian Warre, after foure yeeres continuance; and such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glorie whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

GENTIVS, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

* Called now Scutari.

About the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius; had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fifteene thousand; with which hee was at Lissus, readie to assist King Perseus; as soone as the money should come, whereof hee had receiued onely tenne Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him; ouercame him; and draue him into Scodra*. This Towne was verie defensible by nature, besides the helpe of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme vnpossible to bee wonne, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victorie; and therefore presented his Armie before the walles, making countenance to giue an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily haue defended themselves within the Towne, would needes issue forth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than courageous: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazedly to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadors; by whom, at first, hee desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadors, to haue recourse to such mediation. But hee thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadors into prison; where they were still aliue. Hauing obtained three dayes respite, hee passed vp a Riuer, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more priuately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caracantius was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. Hee sent messengers crauing access vnto the Prætor: before whom hauing lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) hee fell downe humbly, and yielded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdome, together with his wife, children, brother, and friends, were presently giuen vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun; vntill Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had bene imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

See-

How the Romans behaued themselves in Greece and Macedon after their victory ouer PERSEVS.

Now began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to looke tyrannically vpon those that had bene vnmanly toward them before, whilst the Warre with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with bad grace; saying, that they were sent from Rhodes to make an ouerture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no lesse grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome; that it was ended much more happily than had bene expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for loue to Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should be taken, By these threats, and the desire of some (couetous of the charge) to haue Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadors were so affrighted, that in mourning apprell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had bene any whit auerfe from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that flue themselves for feare, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would haue done, if olde M. Cato, a man by nature vehemēt, had not vttered a milde sentence, and aduertised the Senate, That in decreeing Warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedie to ransacke, than any iust cause, had moued them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the Warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whome, none of any make remained aliue, saue those that had bene of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many yeeres passed, ere by importunate suit, they could bee admitted into the societie of the Romans: a fauour which till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselves better without it, as equal friends.

With the like, or greater seueritie, did the Romans make themselves terrible in

lib. 1.

all parts of Greece. Amphilus himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power hee had over them. More than five hundred of the chief citizens in Demetrius were slaine at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with helpe of the Roman souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul; the redresse was such, as required not the paines of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, hee sealed like a King, with excessive cheere, yet so, that hee had all things very cheape in his. Came an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in lending prouisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadors likewise were sent from Rome, some, to giue order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was vsuall in such cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The Kingdome of Macedon was set at liberty by Amphilus and the Embassadors, his assistants, who had order therefrom from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had beene payed vnto the Kings, was lessened by halfe. As for the rest, the Countrey was diuided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobilitie were sent captiue into Italy, with their wives and children, as many as were aboute fiftene yeeres old. The ancient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new giuen by Amphilus. Such mischief the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue any inconuenience that should bee worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subiects to Rome; the things done to them could deserue no better name than meere tyrannie, yea and shamelesse priuery; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadors that were sent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from euery quarter, as had any way discovered an vnscrutable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that respect, though they were no subiects, yet wanted there no colour, for vsing them as traitors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for hauing bene openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achaens these Embassadors were to deale more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong (though this were to bee regarded by them, hauing no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue vntractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of signe, by letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achaens could be suspiciously charged to haue held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had bene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their seruice to the Romans, but onely such as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadors neglect to vse the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season serued fitly to ranke the Achaens with the rest. And hereto Callicrates was very vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, hee and his fellows should bee made to pay for their mischievous devices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadors came among the Achaens: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callicrates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perseus.

This

This being so; he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence giuen, he would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well doe, we will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence; then should I like wife haue bene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall thoroughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassador laid hold, and said that euen so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill hee had cited aboute a thousand, willing them to appeare, and answer before the Senate. This might euen be tearmed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Countrey; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, and regard of the publike libertie, should dwell together in any of the Greekes. At their comming to Rome, they were all cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achaens. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondered, that any such honest care of these innocent men could bee remaining: since honestie had bene thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achaens, nor yet held to bee offenders. But in stead of better answer it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrey, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Achaens, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all, vntill after seuentene yeeres, fewer than thirtie of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian was one. All the rest were either dead in prison, or hauing made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of iayle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserue the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiours, gaue order, That the whole Countrey of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Amphilus with mischieuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; he sent vnto the Epirots for tenne of the principall men out of euery Citie. These he commanded to deliuer vp all the Gold and Siluer which they had; and sent along with them, into euery of their Townes, what companies of men he thought conuenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, euery one the Towne whereinto hee was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoiled by the Roman Souldiours; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserued punishment, as hauing fauoured Perseus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had ben already sent into Italy, there to receiue their due; and since this Nation, in general, was not onely at the present in good obedience, but had, euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleeeue it, had any one Writer deliuered the contrarie. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marvellous, that God was pleased to make Amphilus childlesse, euen in the glorie of his triumph, how great fouler otherwise his vertues were.

In

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greekes and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacye of an Embassage sent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we speake, we must speake somewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himselfe, and of his affaires about which these Embassadours came.

ANTIOCHVS the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the short time following of his raigne and life. He died the six and thirtieth yeere after he had worne a Crowne, and in the seventeenth or eighteenth of Ptolemie Epiphanes: while hee attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Iustine) of Iupiter. Hee left behinde him three sonnes, Seleucus Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom hee had giuen in marriage to Ptolemie Epiphanes, King of Egypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldest of Antiochus his sonnes; raigned in Syria twelue yeeres, according to Eusebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Iosephus giue him but seuen. A Prince, who as hee was slothfull by nature; so the great losse which his father Antiochus had received, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeeres before his birth, Daniel gaue this judgement, Es sedit in loco eius vilissimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (speaking of Antiochus the Father of this man) ball'st up a wilde person, unworthy the honor of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, those things were done which are spoken of Onias the High Priest, in these words, and other to the same effect: What time as the holy Citie was inhabited with all Peace, because of the godlinesse of ONIAS the Priest, it came to passe, that euen the King did honor the place, and garnished the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the second of Maccabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Apollonius betrayed the Treasures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus sent by the King to seize them; of his miraculous striking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his successor Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the raigne of this King, that the bookes of the Maccabees take beginning. Which bookes seeme not to bee deliuered by one and the same hand. For the first booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his storie, nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successor of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabees (who died in the hundred threecore and seuenteenth yeere of the Greekes in Syria) that first booke treateth. The Author of the second booke, although he take the Story somewhat further off, by way of a Proeme, yet hee endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Grecian raigne, and with the death of Nicanor, slaine by Judas: remembering in the fourth Chapter the practice of Iafon the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, preuailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor for the Priesthood. It is also held by Ianinius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arrius King of the Spartans sent Embassadours to the Jewes, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence betwene them and the Greekes, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himselfe directed to the people of Sparta by Nomenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom hee employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arrius had sent to Onias the High Priest, whereto Iosephus addes, addes, that the name of the Lacedemonian Embassador was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her claws.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seuen and thirtieth yeere of the Greekes in Syria. Hee was the second sonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also hee vsurped from his brothers sonne.

Ptolemie Philometor, his Nephew by his sister Cleopatra, being then very yong, had been about seuen yeeres King of Egypt.

Ptolemie Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had raigned in Egypt foure and twenty yeeres; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his Kingdom between them, whilst hee was a child. But they found such other busines, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue out their vniust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolemie, the Provinces of Callosyria, Phenice, and Iudaea, which hee had wonne by his victory ouer Scopas, that was General of the Egyptian forces in those parts. Neuerthelesse, Ptolemie adhered to the Romans: whereby hee liued in the greater securitie. Hee left behind him two sons; this Ptolemie Philometor, and Ptolemie Physcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom shee was cast off, and her daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolemie Philometor, so called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickname, because hee slew her, fell into hatred with his subjects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdom, his younger brother being set vp against him. Physcon having a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometor held himselfe in Memphis, craving succour of King Antiochus his vncl. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vpon him the protection of the young Prince, fought by all meanes possible to possesse himselfe of that Kingdom. Hee sent Apollonius the sonne of Mnesibius Embassadour into Egypt, and vnder colour to assill the Kings Coronation, hee gaue him instructions to perswade the Gouvernours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the King his Nephew with the principall places of that Kingdom into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephewes safety and well doing. And the better to answere all argument to the contrary, hee prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came hee alongst the coast of Syria to Ioppe, and from thence on the sudden hee turned himselfe towards Ierusalem, where, by Iafon the Priest (a Chaplin fit for such a Patron) hee was with all pompe and solemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessour of Epiphanes, that impious Traitor Simon of the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when hee would haue deliuered the treasures thereof to Apollonius Gouvernour of Callosyria and Phenice, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from heauen; the said Apollonius being shrunken by the Angel of God, and recovering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet sufficent not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practices. Presently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iafon, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtaine the Priesthood for himselfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threecore talents of siluer, with other rents and summes of money. So hee got his desire, though hee not long inioyed it.

This naughty dealing of Iafon, and his being ouer-reached by another in the same kinde, calls to minde a by-word taken vpon among the Acheans, when as that mischieuous Calliocrates, who had bene too hard for all worlde and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

One

One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
 One Wolfe than other Walues does bite more fore;
 One Hawke than other Hawkes more swift does fly;
 So one most mischievous of men before,
 CALLICRATES, false knave as knave might be,
 Met with MENALCIDAS more false than he.

And euen thus fell it out with Isafon: who within three yeeres after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Priethood for himselfe: Isafon thereupon being forced to flee from Ierusalem, and to hide himselfe among the Ammonites.

From Ierusalem, Antiochus marched into Phoenicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty armie of land-forces, he went about to raigine ouer Egypt, that he might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mighty company, with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Train, and moued warre against PTOLEMEVS King of Egypt, but PTOLEMEVS was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death. He was many strong Cities, and tooke away the spoiles of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecie of DANIEL: He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Provinces, and he shall do that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victorie ouer the Egyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For hee gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolemie, betweene Pelufum and the hill Casius, after which he entred, and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that ANTIOCHVS had smitten Egypt, hee turned againe, and went up towards Irac and Ierusalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and a table of the Shew-bread, and the Pouring Vessels, and the Bowles, and the golden Basins, and the Vails, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. Hee tooke also the Silver and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first layd claime to Calofyria; iustifying his title by * the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffely auerring, that this Province had not bene consigned ouer to the Egyptian, or giuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. Ealie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Acheans, Rhodiens, Athenians, and other of the Greekes, pressed him, by seuerall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrines could be contented to receiue their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolemies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when hee saw, that it was an hard piece of worke to take Alexandria by force: hee thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine warre, than by the terrour of his armes, threatening destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his forces for the present; leaving the Ptolemies in very weak estate; the younger, almost ruinated by his inuasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people.

But how weak fouer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to bee so strong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him while at Antioch; and then made a iourney into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thurians and other in those parts: who had bin giuen, as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For

Gouernour

Gouernour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus a man of great authoritie about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Isafon out of the Priethood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an Income, committing the charge of the Priethood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adjoining. This he did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Softratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Isafon) had certaine knowledge, being moued with zeale, and detesting the sacrilege of Menelaus, hee reprooued him for it; and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoining as a suburb to Antioch. In compass it had about ten milles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, sweete Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust, and other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claime priuiledge, from the holines of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Only I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is far lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to iudge this fearfull blift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore old man: for MENELAYS taking ANDRONICVS apart, prayed him to slay Mac. li. 24.4. ONIAS. So when he came to ONIAS, he counselled him craftily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswading him to come out of the Sanctuary, so he slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousness. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his returne out of Cilicia, hee tooke away ANDRONICVS his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the Citie, and in the same place where hee had committed the wickednesse against ONIAS, hee was slaine as a murderer. In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should haue thought that this wicked King had once in his life-time done Iustice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolemie, a traytor to Ptolemie Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death; who iustly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outrageous will, and not by any regard of iustice: since hee reuenged the death of Onias, yet slue those that were in the same cause with Onias; who, had they told their cause, yet, before the Scythians, they should haue been heard as innocent. By reason of such his vntheadinesse, this King was commonly termed Epi manes; that is, made, in stead of Epi phanes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there seene throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem, for sy dayes long, horsemen running in the ayre with robes of gold, and as bands of Spear men, and as troupes of Horsemen set in aray, encountering and coursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather forewarnings of God, all Historiours haue deliuered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespasian, a Barric in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens directly ouer the Citie, after which there followed a slaughter like vnto this of Epi phanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Pliny tells vs, that Armies were seene fighting in the ayre from the morning till the euening.

In the time of Pope Iohn the eleuenth, a fountaine poured out blood in stead of water, in or near the Citie of Genoa; soone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vespera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one seemeth to me the most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the

Off-spring

Off-spring of the Cæsars, as well naturall as adopted, toke end; whereof this notable signe gaue warning.

Sueton. Calig.

When Linia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Henne, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Linia cauted this Henne to bee carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Henne came a faire encrease of white Poultry, and from the little branch there sprang vpon time a Grove of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerours did vie to carrie in their bands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove, and after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were obserued, when they happened to wither, to fore-shew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero, all the broodes of the white Hennes died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Jewes did not thinke such strange signes to bee unworthy of regard; it appeares by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolemie being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power 20 of their vncle; thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physcon had not as yet forgotten the terror of the former siege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcity of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreme) since nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to bee hoped for without reconconciliation. These good helpes, and aboue all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein hee stood of his vncle. For though Antiochus were gone out 30 of Egypt with his armie; yet had hee left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusium, retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne vie. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so 25 by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, hee was greatly enrag'd: for notwithstanding that hee had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to subiect his younger brother vnto him, which he gaue in answer to all Embassadors; yet hee now prepared to make sharpe warre vpon them both. And to that end hee presently furnished and sent out his Naue towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Celestria, readie to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as fast as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadors sent from Ptolemie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beseech him, That hee would rather bee pleased to signifie what hee required to haue done in Egypt, which should bee performed, than to enter it as an enemie with so puissant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That he would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolemie should surrender into his hands together with the Citie of Pelusium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that hee should also abandon and leaue vnto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that he had vnto either of them for cuer. For answer vnto these demands, hee set downe a day certaine, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolemie in Arabia, as in Egypt it selfe; for Memphis, and all about it, receiued Antiochus, being vnable to resist him. The King hauing now no stoppe in his way to Alexandria; passed on thitherwards by easie journeyes.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or, were contented to finde, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the iuster cause. Yet they gaue signification, that it would be much displeasing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome 10 of Egypt taken from the rightful owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loth to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuerthelesse, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in neede of helpe against their vncle, who prepared and made open warre against them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greekes, as being thereto obliged by notable benefites, should arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had bene sustained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal, when Italy lying waste, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy sufficient store. By helpe of the Egyptians, had Attalus laide the foundation of that greattresse, whereto the Acheans attained. And by the like helpe, had 20 Rhodes bene defended against Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were these friendly turnes, which that bountifull house of the Ptolemies had done for sundry people abroad, ill followed, or seconded, by other as bad in requittall: but with continuance of stable beneficence, from time to time encreased. Wherefore the two brothers sent abroad confidently for ayde; especially to the Rhadians and Acheans, who seemed most able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Physcon and Cleopatra had sent, a yeere since; but their Embassadors lay still in Rome. Of the Acheans they desired in particular, that Lyortas the braue warriour might bee sent to them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his sonne Polybius, Generall of the Horse. Heereunto the Acheans readily condescended: and would immediately 30 haue made performance; if Callicrates had not interposed his mischievous arte. Hee, whether seeking occasion to vaunt his obsequiousnesse to the Romans; or much rather enuying those Noble Captaines, whose seruice the Kings desired; withstood the common voyce, which was, That their Nation should, not with such small numbers as were requested, but with all their power, be ayding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee saide) convenient time to entangle themselves in any such buisnesse, as might make them the lesse able to yeeld vnto the Romans, whathelpe forer should bee required in the Macedonian warre. And in this sentence, hee with those of his faction, obitainely persisted; terrifying others with bigge wordes, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that 40 Martius the late Consull had signified vnto him, that the Romans were past all neede of helpe: adding further, that a thousand foote, and two hundred horse, might well bee spared, to the ayde of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without disabling their Nation to performe any seruice to the Romans; for as much as the Acheans could without trouble, raise thirtie or fortie thousand Souldiours. All this notwithstanding, the resolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree should haue passed; hee brought into the Theater where the assembly was held, a Messenger with letters from Martius; whereby the Acheans were desired to conforme themselves to the Roman Senate; and to labour as the Senate had 50 done, by sending Embassadors to set Egypt in pence. This was an aduice against all reason. For the Senate had indeed sent Embassadors to make peace; but as in a time of greater buisnesse elsewhere, with such milde wordes, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Acheans should doe any good in the same kinde. Yet Polibius and his friends, durst not gaine-say the Romane Councell; which had force of an injunction. So the Kings were left in much distresse; disappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perseus overcome: and then might the Embassador sent from the Romane Senate, performe as much as any Arme could haue done.

Audience had bene lately given by the Senate, vnto those Embassadors of Physon and Cleopatra; which hauing stayed more then a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their businesse to effect vntill now. The Embassadors deliuered their message in the name of those that had sent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no lesse than his Brother and Sister.

Polyb. Legat. 72.

In this Embassage of Ptolemie, now requesting helpe from Rome; appeared a notable change of his fortune, from such as it had bene before three or foure yeeres last past. For in the beginning of these his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Eulaeus, or Lenaxus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layd) which had the government of him, thought his affaires in such good estate, that not onely he determined to let vpon Antiochus, for Calestria; but would haue interposed himselfe betweene the Romans and Perseus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embassage was by a friend perswaded to forget that point of his errand. From these high thoughts, hee fell on the sudden, by the rebellion of his brother and subiects, to liue vnder protection of the same Antiochus. And now at such time as by atonement with his brother and subiects, hee might haue seemed to stand in no neede of such protection, hee hath remaining none other helpe whereby to saue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister shewed it selfe, even in the habit of those Embassadors. They were poorly clad; the haire of their heades and bearded ouer-grownne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their handes, branches of Oliue. Thus they entred into the Senate; and there fell, groueling and prostrate vpon the floor. Their garments were not so meane and mournfull, nor their looks and Countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Countrey stood; they made a pitifull and grievous complaint vnto the Senate, beseeching them to haue compassion of their estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly and faithfull to the Romans. They saide that the people of Rome had so much heretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleased but to send their Embassadors, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vndertaking vpon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Arme out of Egypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vsed any delay; then should Ptolemie and Cleopatra, be shortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make repaite to Rome, with shamefull dishonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieue them.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadors to determine and end the warre betweene those Kings. In commission they had first to find King Ptolemie, and then Antiochus, and to let them both vnderstand, that vnlesse they surceased, and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or vsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadors, tooke their leaue, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest

Whilest Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Arme ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. So neere was hee to the end of his journey, when the Roman Embassadors met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Rolle of paper; willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before hee did anie thing else. Antiochus did so; and hauing a little while considered of the businesse, hee tolde Popilius, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadors their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinarie blunt manner of speech, which hee had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after hee had stayed and pawled awhile, I will be content (quoth he) to doe whatsoever the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allice of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without anie good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such manner as Daniel had prophesied long before: yea, fulfilling euerie particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Ierusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather bene historified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed awhile, and settled the Kingdome of Egypt, leaving it vnto the elder brother, and appointing the younger to raigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had bene, in the power of the Egyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had alreadye giuen an ouerthrow to the Egyptian Ships.

Dan. cap. 11. ver. 43, 44, 45.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Masanissa, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instabilitie of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anticus, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Worke.

BY this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message; and by the readie obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had bene well contented, a yeare before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Acheans and Etolians, when hee went Embassage to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadors which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse vsed anie menacing tearmes, though hee performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victorie ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the *Gallio*grees, which molested him. Verie welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bade him be confident, and requested of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee cyther approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaýmed by the faithfull counsaile of Stratius a Physician; whome Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the crand about which hee had bene sent; recounted his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre,* wherewithall hee forgot not to make of his brother as good mention as he could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Aenus and Maronea might be bellowed vpon himselfe. * By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceiued opinion, 10 that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore, to make him vnderstand how gracious hee was, they not only graunted all his desire; but in the presents which they gaue to him (as was their custome to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Neuertheless, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already graunted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst hee was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the libertie of Aenus and Maronea: thereby making vneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Gallogrecques, which were about to invade the Kingdome of Pergamus; they sent Embassa- 20 dours to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate beeing so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthe of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. Hee might well blame the follie of his second voyage thither, for this necessitie of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, hee had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne dores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was readie to send him going. It was not thought expedient to vse him as an enemy, that came to visit them in loue: neyther could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of singular inconstancie: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would per- 30 mit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had bene at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcommed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entring into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kissed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and fauours: as also hee vsed to weare a Cap, after the manner of slaues newly manumitted, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. Hee was indeede naturally a slaue, and one that by such abject flatterie kept himselfe 40 safe; though doing otherwise greater mischief than anie wherewith Perseus had bene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whome he brought with him to Rome, there to receiue education. Further petition he made, to haue some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the graunt would haue bene vnjust, hee receiued a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his sonne, it was vnderaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But aboue all other Kings, Masaniissa held his credit with the Romans good. 50 His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue judgement on on his side: and whereas hee had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Townes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidian, for hauing hindered him of his due so long. Now indeede had Rome good leysure to deuise vpon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masaniissa himselfe was shortly by them rooted vp. But hereof the olde King neuer dreamed. Hee sent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victorie ouer Perseus; and offered to come thither himselfe, there to sacrifice for joy vnto Iupiter in the Capitol. His good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreated to stay at home.

Cotys the Thracian sent Embassadors, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him giuen to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to entreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at libertie for conuenient ranfome. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giuing hostages, without necessitie: Yet was his sonne giuen backe to him ranfome-free; with admonition, to carrie himselfe better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay betwene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those vnhappy Kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were ledde through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Emilius and Anicius. Perseus had often made suite to Emilius, that hee might not be put to such disgrace: but hee still receiued one skornefull answer, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that hee might kill himselfe. And surely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than hee found, hee would rather haue sought his death in Macedon, than haue bene beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman 30 clemencie, wherof Emilius had giuen him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow King, had bene ledde in chaynes through the streetes, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe sacrifice, hee should command the captiues to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were ouercome, might be both together at the vtmost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Perseus: yet so, that hee had little joy of his life; but cyther famished himselfe, or (for it is diuersly reported) was 40 kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sonnes, two died; it is vn certaine how. The youngest called Alexander (onely in name like vnto the Great, though defined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a Ioyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe vnder the Roman Officers. In such poeuerie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eightscore yeares after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had knowne it before, that his owne sonne should one day be compelled to earne his liuing by handie-woke, in a painefull Occupation; it is 50 like, that he would not, as in a wantonneffe of Soueraigneticke, haue commaunded those poore men to be slaue, which had recouered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diuing. He would rather haue bene verie gentle, and would haue considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most vnderodden wretches, are all subject vnto One high Power, governing all alike with absolute command.

But

But such is our unhappinesse; in stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as yee would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; wee entertaine that arrogant thought, I will be like to the Most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

All, or the most, haue a vaine desire of abilitie to doe euill without controule: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath graunted such power to verie few: among whom also, verie few there are, that vse it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other nearnesse in blood, be driuen to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that gouernes one, the most vnworthie of his whole 20 house, yet raigning ouer all? The vtminely death of manie Princes, which could not humble themselves to such flatterie; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hercof. Hereto may be added, That the heire of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparent to the Crowne of England: which had been obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemy, to exercise the same vpon the Line of that unhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie 30 the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so doe they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happie that Countreie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach, That "God is the freest and sharpest Schoolemaister, that can be devised, for such Kings, as thinke this world ordained for them, without controulment to turne it upside-downe at their pleasure.

Chap. 3. §. 4.

Now, concerning the Triumph of L. Aemilius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person, that was led along therein, as part of his owne spoyle; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Bootie. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasure, that from thenceforth, vntill the ciuill Warres, which followed vpon the death of Julius Caesar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with anie Tribute. Ycr was this noble Triumph likely to haue bene hindered by the souldiors; who grudget at their Generall, for not hauing dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiors herein, and brought them to reason by seuerer exhortations. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuerthelesse, it pleased God to take away from him his two remanyn sonnes, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died fife dayes before the Triumph; the other, three dayes 50 after it. This losse hee bore wisely: and told the People, That hee hoped to see the Commonwealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie; since the joy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About

About the same time, Octavius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace; and Anicius the Pretor, who had conquered Ilyria, and taken King Genetius prisoner; made their severall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles; together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their dutie in person; were enough to say vnto Rome, Sonne super biam, Take upon thee the Maisie, that thy deserts haue purchased.

BY this which we haue already set downe, is scene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We haue left it flourishing in the middle of the field; hauing rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaves shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, and conquering Nations, haue bin the subiect of those ancient Histories, which haue bene preserved, and yet remaine among vs; and 20 withall of so many tragical Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mightie men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, the greatest Lords of the world haue bene stirred vp, rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Airc, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation, and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proues. And certainly, as Fame hath often bene dangerous to the liuing, 30 so is it to the dead of no vse at all, because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreme ill bargain of buying this lasting discounte, vnderstood by them which are dissolued; they themselves would then rather haue wished, to haue stolne out of the world without noyse; than to be put in minde, that they haue purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and crueltie, by giuing in spoile the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatesse nor continuance) there hath bene no State fearefull in the East, but that of the Turke; nor in the West any Prince that hath sped his wings farre ouer his nest, but the Spaniard; who since the time that Ferdinand expelled the 40 Moores out of Granado, haue made many attempts to make themselves Masters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treasures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdomes which they possesse in Europe, they are at this day the most powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoised by the Persian, so in stead of so many Millions as haue been spent by the English, French, and Netherlands in a defenseless war, and in diuersions against them, it is easie to demonstrate, that with the charge of two hundred thousand pound continued but for two yeares or three at the most, they may not only be persuaded to liue in peace, but all their swelling and ouerflowing streames may be brought backe into their naturall channels and old banks. These two Nations, I say, are at this day the most eminent, and to be 50 regarded; the one seeking to roote out the Christian Religion altogether, the other the truth and sincere profession thereof, the one to joyne all Europe to Asia, the other the rest of all Europe to Spain.

For the rest, if we seeke a reason of the succession and continuance of this boundlesse ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath bin already said; That

That the Kings and Princes of the world haue alwayes laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of those great Ones which preceded them. They are alwayes transported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miserie of the other, till they find the experience in themselves. They neglect the aduice of GOD, while they enjoy life, or hope it; but they follow the counsell of Death, vpon his first approach. It is he that puts into man all the wisdom of the world, without speaking a word; which GOD with all the words of his Law, promises, or threats, doth not infuse. Death, which hateth and destroyeth man, is beleeced; GOD, which hath made him and loues him, is alwayes deferred. I haue considered (saith SALOMON) all the works that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, to and vexation of spirit: but who beleeceth it, till Death tells it vs? It was Death, which opening the conscience of Charles the first, made him enjoyne his sonne Philip to restore Nauarre; and King Francis the first of France, to command that justice should be done vpon the Murderers of the Protestants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can suddenly make man to know himselfe. He tells the proud and insolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the instant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepassed happinesse. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath interest in nothing, but in the grauell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glasse before the eyes of the most beautifull, and makes them see therein, their deformitie and rotnenesse; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, iust and mightie Death! whom none could aduise, thou hast perswaded, what none hath dared, thou hast done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only hast cast out of the world and despised: thou hast drawne together all the farre stretched greatnesse, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with these two narrow words, Hic iacet.

Lastly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calles it selfe, The first part of the Generall Historie of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I also intended, and haue hewne out; besides many other discouragements, ³⁰ perswading my silence, it hath pleased GOD to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whose vnspokeable and neuer enough lamented losse, hath taught me to say with Iob, Versa est in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

To the Reader.

The use of Chronologicall Tables is needfull to all Historiographers, that reach to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: since they cannot, like Annales, yearly set downe all Occurrences not coherent. This here following, may serue as an Index to the present Part of this Worke; pointing vnto the severall matters, that hauing fallen out at one time, are furre disioyned in the Relation. Certainly it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that anie can be. For howfewer the years of the first Patriarchs may seeme to haue bene well-neere complet, yet in the reignes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, wee finde manie frictions, and the last yeare, or yeares, of one King reckoned also as the forme of another. The same is most likely to haue fallen out in manie other; though not so precisely recorded. Hereto may be added the diuerse and imperfect formes of the year, which were in use among sundrie Nations: causing the * Summer * Sec. Lib. 1. 12. Months, in proesse of some Ages, to fall into the Winter; and so breeding extreme confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small part of trouble, to chuse, out of so manie, and so utterly discrepant computations, as haue already gotten authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alleged, in excuse of such error as a more intente and perfect Calculator shall happen to finde herein. It may serue to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane iudgement) from anie notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, euen in that regard; not onely for some errors of the Presse, in the numbering of yeares, but for some battie mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to haue hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if he be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The Titles ouer the Columns, haue reference to that which followes vnder them; ³⁰ as will readily be concerned. Where two Titles or more, are ouer the head, as ^{Rome} ^{Nation} ^{off} ^{for} there doe the numbers underneath answer proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ierusalem were finished in the 319. yeare from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from NABONASSAR. In like manner it is to be understood, That IEHOSOPHAT began his reign in the 374. of the IULIAN Era, in the 3092. of the world, and in the 99. yeare of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeede so much, to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To auoid prolixitie, I haue forborne to insert those yeares, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Raigne; some change of Government; some

⁴⁰ Battail fought; or the like. So, of the 12. yeares wherein SYLVIVS CAPETVS reigned ouer the Latines, I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of IEHOSOPHAT, wherein CAPETVS began, vnto the 17. wherein SYLVIVS AVENTINVS succeeded, and wherein IEHORAM first reigned with IEHOSOPHAT his father. For I thinke it vaine to haue filled up a Page with 12. lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2. 3. 4. 5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of AVENTINVS, and 17. of IEHOSOPHAT. In setting downe the Kings, there is noted ouer the head of euerie one, what place he held in order of Succession; as whether he were the first, second, fift, seventh, or so forth in ranke, of those that reigned in his Countrey, without notable interruption. Before the name is the first yeare of his raigne; at the end, or foot of the name, as the space giues leaue, is the whole number of yeares in which he reigned; in the spaces following underneath are those yeares of his, which were concurrant with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeare of anie remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there is it to be understood, that the same yeare belonged, not onely to the King then beginning, but vnto some one, or more, of his

his fore-gears: as the first year of JEROMAH King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother AHZIA, and the 22^d. of his father AHAB. So, where two or three names are found in one place; as in the 307th. year of the World, ZIMRI, TIBNI, and OMRI: it is meant, that curie one of them reigned in some part of the same year; which is reckoned the second of ELA, and the first of OMRI. Particularly, under the years of the Egyptian Kings are set downe the years of those DYNASTIES, which it was thought meet to infer; as likewise, otherwise, the day of the month upon which NABONASSARS year began: which, how it varied from other yeares, may be found in the place left above cited.

Concerning the Ætior account of yeres: from IPIITVS, who began the Olympiads, to from Rome built, from NABONASSAR, and the like; as much as was thought convenient hath bene said, where due place was, in the Booke itselfe: so as it remaineth onely to note, that vnder the title of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeare of that Olympiad: as that CYRVS began his reigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeare thereof.

Now, for that the Years of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of NABONASSAR, and other, had not beginning in one month, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midwinter, and some at other times: the better to express their several beginnings; some painful Chronologers have divided them proportionally in their several Columns; opposing part of the one year to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overboard with one [straight line, as if] all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I shew'd, as more troublesome than useful; since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will only be needfull to observe, that howsoever the Æra of the Olympiads be 24. years older than that of Rome, and 29. than that of NABONASSAR, yet the Æra of some King may have begun at such a time of the year as did not juſt with this difference. But hereto I take little regard. The more curious will easily find my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficulty. One familiar example may plane all. Queene ELIZABETH began her reigne the 17. of November, in the year of our LORD 1558. Shee was crowned; held a Parliament; brake it up; threw downe Images; and reformed many things in Religion; all in her first year: yet not all in that year 1558, but the greater part in the year following; whether we begin with the first of Januare, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table; but so, as the difference is never of a whole year.

The IULIAN Period, which I have placed, as the greater number, over the years of the World, was devised by that honorable and excellently learned JOSEPH SCALIGER: being accommodated to the IULIAN years, now in use among us. Its consisteth of 7980 years; which result from the multiplication of 19.28. and 15; that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sunne, and the years of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present year; or if no fraction remaine, it shewes the last year of that Cycle to be current. For example: in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great battaile of Cannæ, the Prime or Golden number was 14, the Cycle of the Sunne 18, and consequently the Dominical letter F. as may be found by dividing the same number of the IULIAN Period 4498, by 19 for the Prime, by 28, for the Cycle of the Sunne. This IULIAN Period, after the present account, alwayes exceeds the years of the World by 682. Besides the former uses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a year, than any other Era (as From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertaine position.

More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in workes of this kinde: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plaine enough to the vulgar.
